The President then delivered his Presidential Address as follows:—

Paper 549.

OPENING ADDRESS.

By Mr. Percival F. Tuckett (President).

I am here to-night to perform a duty which is imposed upon me by By-law 53, a duty which requires me as President to deliver an address at the first meeting of the Session. It is a duty which I accept willingly, because of the signal honour which the Council have conferred upon me, but diffidently, nevertheless, when I remember the great surveyors who have preceded me and their eminence in their profession. I can only say how proud I am, after being a member of The Institution for forty-two years, to hold the highest position which that membership has to offer ; how sincere is my hope that during my year of office I may be able, in however small a degree, to further the best interests both of The Institution and yourselves, and to prove worthy both of your confidence and the high traditions of my predecessors.

Of the responsibilities of my office I am fully conscious ; they increase cumulatively with the passing of the years, with our growing membership, and with the growing complexity of the problems which chartered surveyors, both individually and collectively, are called upon to face. No less am I conscious that the honour which attaches to the Presidency is the greater on that account. But whatever feelings or whatever fears I may have had on assuming office, I knew and know that the President may count upon the whole-hearted confidence of his colleagues on the Council, of the County Branches, and of the general body of members. With that knowledge my task and my responsibilities are greatly lightened.

The first, and perhaps the most difficult, problem which your President has to face is the subject of his opening address. I am your sixty-sixth President ; professional matters, numerous as they are, have been discussed—I might almost say exhaustively discussed in practically every aspect—by my sixty-five predecessors. Rightly or wrongly, therefore, I feel that I am entitled to range over wider fields, and to touch upon some of those present-day problems which fall outside our immediate domestic sphere. The profession of a surveyor being what it is, and impinging as it does upon the life and work of the community at so many points, it seems to me that a discussion of those wider problems is very relevant to our future, not only as citizens but as surveyors as well.

Politics, as you doubtless know, are not for The Chartered Surveyors' Institution. The Institution has been careful, and rightly so in my opinion, to avoid identifying itself with any political party or theory. That, however, has not made us the less willing to assist the Government of the day, whatever be their political complexion, with such technical advice as we think will help them in carrying out a predetermined policy. I can assure the Government, and in particular those departments of State with whose functions our work is most closely concerned, that such advice will continue to be freely and impartially given. We exist not only to promote the interests of our profession, but also, in the words of our Royal Charter, to maintain and extend its usefulness to the public advantage.

The liaison work between The Institution and Government departments, which was carried out during our late Secretary's period of office, was a most valuable feature of Mr. Goddard's work. Time was when The Institution was looked upon in some quarters as a body which solely represented the interests of landlords. In the ordinary course of their business, however, our members act both for landlord and tenant, lessor and lessee, and we as an Institution therefore feel it our duty to approach the problems of the land impartially and judicially as between those interests.

To Mr. Goddard much credit is due for the creation of a proper understanding in official circles of the attitude of The Institution in this respect.

Mention of Mr. Goddard recalls the time when as a young member of The Institution and an assistant to Sir John Rolleston he delivered an interesting Paper on the subject of bi-metallism, and its potentialities as a cure for the depression in agriculture which then prevailed. The subject of the Paper so horrified Mr. Julian Rogers, the then Secretary, that he persuaded my father to write a Paper advocating the advantages of mono-metallism. The two Papers were read together, and produced a lengthy, even heated, discussion. I was very young at the time, but the impression which those Papers and that discussion left on my mind, was that bi-metallism was an ingenious method of getting rid of debts by debasing currency, and that the debtor was almost always a bimetallist and the mono-metallist almost always a creditor.

Those were times of high prosperity for trade and industry in England and the world at large. British agriculture alone was suffering from an influx of imports at prices well below its own costs of production. If there was a place in our Transactions for a Paper on monetary problems then, it is surely the more necessary now that we should give our minds to those same problems to-day, when the economic health of the world is so seriously threatened, and when the lifeblood of international trade barely trickles through its hardened arteries. There are even some who prophesy the total collapse of civilisation. The crisis is at any rate sufficiently serious ; and I feel that it is the duty of everyone, so far as he can, to make a study of causes and possible cures, and to have the courage of his opinions even though they be not very wise nor learned.

Whether my views are right or wrong is of small account ; part, at any rate, of the object of this Address will have been achieved if I succeed in giving you food for thought. And think for yourselves I hope you will, in spite of the growing temptation which besets us to-day not to do any thinking for ourselves at all. Communist and Fascist dictatorships, American " brain trusts," the Press and wireless broadcasting are, it seems to me, combining the methods of the bully and the anæsthetist to deprive the individual of his power of thought. Let us here, in England, where some at any rate of these forces as yet do not operate, endeavour to practise thinking while we may.

Let us first of all consider the general extravagance which has been so conspicuous a feature of public administration in all countries since the War. On all sides there has been spending above income and living on borrowed money. On every hand there has been vast expenditure on social services without regard to means. Great Britain, in this respect, has been as great an offender as any, and it was not until the financial crisis of two years ago, and the change of Government which followed, that a halt was called in the march to national bankruptcy.

Unfortunately, however, as it now appears, the call for indiscriminate economy had unhappy results. Whether or not it was intended, the stopping of unremunerative expenditure brought with it the closing down of public works which, in time, would have paid for themselves. Confidence was shattered, private building and redevelopment were abandoned or indefinitely postponed. Unemployment in the building industry, the second largest in the country, rose by leaps and bounds, and with it the already immense calls upon unemployment insurance funds.

I am not a political economist, and I do not propose to lose myself in the mazes of modern economic theory. I will content myself with saying that I welcome the saner outlook on questions of public expenditure which appears to be gaining ground to-day, an outlook which calls for the ruthless application of the pruning knife to unreproductive expenditure, yet encourages wise spending and the promotion of employment on work which is really needed, work which at the present level of prices can be carried out better and more cheaply than in times of prosperity. For this reason there are few who will hesitate to congratulate the present Administration on its active slum clearance policy, and upon their decision to proceed with the erection of the great Government building in Whitehall. The latter alone should do much to stimulate a revival of confidence in the building trades.

The loss of confidence between nations, the building up of tariff barriers and the fall in world prices against gold have combined to drive most of the world off the gold standard, and England into a policy of protection. But in that policy we are still half-hearted. I speak as a lifelong free trader, but I say, nevertheless, that having adopted protection, we are surely unwise in not using the weapons it gives us to the best advantage.

Protection, however, even when fully used, is only a means to an end, and a weapon of defence. It is good so far as it goes, but it is only a step on the path to real prosperity. Britain cannot survive on internal trade alone. We must set our faces to the goal of an international revival, to the return of that era of confidence when England was a free trader and a free lender, and the streams of commerce flowed swift and clear the world over. The accursed legacy of inter-Governmental debts, the misuse and maldistribution of gold, exchange restrictions, high tariffs, and the growth of a morbid and suspicious nationalism must be swept away.

Yes, it may well be asked, but how? The World Economic Conference, of which so much was hoped, has to all intents and purposes failed. The fear of war again stalks through Europe, and nationalism marches on with giant strides. The requirements of international trade and international finance are treated by statesmen, and even by some economists, with more contempt than at any time since the sixteenth century. I believe that if only the three chief creditor nations, if only France, America and ourselves could put our heads together and, taking our courage in our hands, arrange between us to guarantee the issue of a world loan of a thousand million pounds at a low rate of interest, we should be in sight of the end of this depression. Debtor nations would be enabled to convert their existing loans to a lower interest basis, and, with new capital available, confidence would be restored, trade would start afresh and prices would rise normally.

But of the success of the American Recovery Act I am frankly doubtful. I wish Mr. Roosevelt's brave and original experiment every success, but I cannot see how the inevitable laws of supply and demand are to be circumvented by such artificial means. Prices here and there have risen, but so has production and so have costs. Large surplus stocks overhang the markets, but I cannot see where the customers are to be found who will absorb those stocks, augmented as they will be by the increased production contemplated by the Blanket Code, at the higher prices which it is hoped will rule. I do not envy the lot of the small manufacturer and trader in America. Whatever success the experiment has had politically and psychologically, it has already had a bad effect on the relations between capital and labour, and its economic effectiveness has still to be proved.

From the so-called " controlled inflation " of the Recovery Act programme it is but a short step and an easy one to currency inflation pure and simple. That counsel of despair is being strongly pressed in America, and it has its advocates in this country. It is a dangerous specific at any time. Apart from its inherent dishonesty, it can at best only produce on prices a temporary and unhealthy exhilaration at the risk of ultimate disaster. Apart from that, the present time is singularly unsuitable for inflationary experiments. The flight from money into commodities would not increase consumption of the stocks accumulated from an over-productive and overrationalised industry. It would merely transfer their ownership into weaker hands and ruin large classes of consumers. The only hope, in my opinion, lies in a concerted and simultaneous effort by the creditor nations to raise the world price level by means of large-scale lending at low rates of interest, combined with a bold policy of relief from taxation at home.

Whether in these days of enlightenment it is too much to expect a rapprochement between capital and labour I do not know. With good will on both sides, and a realisation of the fact that most men nowadays are both labourers and capitalists, such a rapprochement should surely be capable of attainment. For the man with health and strength, his muscles are still his capital as they were when his prehistoric ancestors lived in caves. Nowadays, however, muscular capital will bear no interest unless it is allied with power of money and power of mind. If the inventor, the industrial organiser and the millionaire should be blessed by anyone, they should be blessed by labour ; and I suspect that the appearance of fifty Henry Fords in England would be welcomed even by the fierier spirits of the Trades Union Congress. But the Henry Fords of this world, though they pay good wages, do not look with favour on the demand of muscular capital that its interest rates be regulated by inflexible statutory minima. They prefer the "open shop," and their workmen go to and from their work in motor-cars.

I have already referred to the agricultural depression of forty years ago. Agriculture worked out its own salvation then, and I believe it might have done so now had its hands not been tied by the regulation of wages without any corresponding measure of protection being given—until recently when it was all but too late—to the sources from which wages flowed.

In this connection I will read you an extract from the Paper which was read by the late Mr. William Sturge in December, 1872, and entitled "Statistical Notes on the "Prices of Agricultural Produce, Labour and Rent":—

" With the aid of the light of the past let us now turn our eyes for a few moments towards the future. It cannot be denied that a cloud looms on the horizon, fraught with elements of anxiety if not of danger—I allude to the labour question. Far be it from me to grudge the agricultural labourer a share in the general prosperity. It cannot be said that his condition has been satisfactory, whether as regards his wages or his habitation, and we must not be surprised at his endeavour to better himself. Labour, like other commodities, must in the long run be regulated by the law of supply and demand. Combination, for the purpose of reaping the benefit of an increased demand for labour, is legitimate and need not be feared were it conducted on fair and proper principles with a board of conciliation and arbitration to settle disputed questions without a resort to the disastrous system of strikes. But, unfortunately, trades unions are conducted in a manner utterly opposed to the principles of political economy and to the interest of the capitalist and the working man. To say nothing of the attacks upon capital, the rules of the unions are destructive of the liberty of the artizan. All other classes in society have full scope for their energy, industry and skill. The union forbids the strong able-bodied, skilful man to benefit by his superior strength and skill by limiting the amount of labour to constitute a fair day's work—that limit being measured by the capabilities of the weaker and less skilful hands. All are thus reduced to one dead level, and a loss is sustained both by the labourer and by the community at large. If similar principles are to be applied to agricultural labour, it is hard to see how farming operations are to be carried on, dependent as they are upon the weather, and requiring to be done precisely at the proper time. If the man is not left at liberty to make his own bargain with his master for piecework, and if in the critical time of harvest the union is to dictate the price of harvest work and to > order a strike if its terms be not complied with, the position of the farmer will be anything but enviable. Let us hope that by reasonable and timely concession the labourer may be deterred from submission to a bondage as hurtful to his own interest as to that of his employer."

Mr. Sturge was all too true a prophet. The Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, has presumably come to stay, with all its attendant disadvantages of wage for age instead of wage for skill and efficiency. A minimum wage has the habit of becoming a maximum wage, and I cannot think it is for the good of the ordinary agricultural labourer that at 21 he should either be receiving the highest wage he is ever likely to earn, or be liable to be dismissed from his employment because of the temptation to the farmer to replace him by a younger man. It cannot be for his good that at twenty-one he should be receiving a wage that will accustom him to a standard of life which he will inevitably have to reduce—and without prospect of improvement—when he marries. I believe that such a state of affairs can only make for discontent and bad citizenship among the agricultural population. As regards the agricultural industry itself, it was only a question of time before the regulation of its costs made it also necessary to regulate the prices it could obtain for its products. I wonder how far those who were responsible for the Agricultural Wages Act foresaw the part it would pay in bringing back protection to this country.

We have been driven into a policy of protection, but we are still hesitating to use it to the best advantage. The Wheat Act has done much to help the arable farmer and the able men who conceived and are administering that measure deserve high credit ; but I, personally, in spite of the well-known political objections to it, would have preferred to see the simpler and more straightforward machinery of an import duty on wheat.

The Wheat Act, however, is in its effect permissive, but with the Agricultural Marketing Acts, and the schemes made under them, the case is different. I live and I work in London, but I should be the last man in England to wish to do or say anything which would hinder the efforts of agriculture to set her house in order and to bring back prosperity to her doors. I wish her well in her new adventure with marketing schemes, but I am frankly pessimistic about the ultimate health of her offspring. I am by nature suspicious of all legislative interference with internal trade and the liberty of the subject, because I am of the opinion that such interference, apart from its continual pin-pricks and irritations, destroys initiative and perpetuates inefficiency. In the case of marketing schemes I fear that they will prolong the business life of the inefficient producer and discourage his active and energetic rival. I fear also that something approaching monopoly conditions will eventually obtain in the trades for which schemes are being made, a state of affairs which cannot be for the good of the community, the manufacturers or the primary producers themselves. In connection with the Hops Marketing Scheme a not uninteresting point of doubt has already, I believe, arisen, and that is whether the quota of production allotted in any particular case attaches to the producer personally or runs with the land.

I believe that a straightforward import duty on bacon and hams would have avoided the expense and complicated machinery of the Pig Marketing Scheme, and would have shown equally satisfactory results. No doubt the ever-present political objections to the taxation of food had to be considered. But the British Exchequer would have benefited, whereas now I foresee that some, at any rate, of the benefit which will come from higher prices of bacon and hams will accrue to the Danish pig farmer. In my opinion it is of little use to attempt to control imports without controlling their price. I am also unconvinced, even in these times of drastic remedies, by the argument that control of the home trade was necessary to prevent over-production. With effective protection against foreign imports I think that the home trade would, as it has done before, have worked out its own salvation according to ordinary and healthy economic laws.

As regards the Milk Marketing Scheme I do not believe that dairy farmers have much cause of complaint against the manufacturing and wholesale distributing interests. The trouble lies in the low price of butter and cheese, combined with over-production. With the fall in corn and fat-stock prices, every farmer who could do so has taken to selling his milk, and, owing to the energy and enterprise of the factories and wholesale milk distributors in providing motor-transport for the collection of milk at outlying farms, the production of milk for sale has received a substantial stimulus. Before the War these outlying farms used their milk for rearing stock and making butter and cheese. The provision, in recent years, of a cash outlet for his milk must have saved many a farmer from bankruptcy.

But while the production of milk for the market has increased enormously, its consumption as a beverage has not risen in anything like the same proportion. In consequence, a much greater portion of the output has to be used for manufacture. Moreover, seasonal conditions in recent years have helped the production of milk, so that even in winter there has been an unprofitable surplus.

The chief outlets for milk, when the requirements of liquid consumption have been satisfied, are its manufacture into cream, butter, cheese and dried milk. Cream was at one time a great standby for the factories. The use of preservatives, however, is now forbidden, and public demand has, as a consequence, largely fallen off. The sale of mulsified cream, on the other hand, is increasing, much to the detriment of farmer and consumer. Butter stands at about eightpence, and cheese at about fourpence a pound. At these prices milk is worth about threepence a gallon, and it is there that the root of the trouble lies.

In my opinion the simpler and straightforward method of helping the farmer would have been to increase the price of butter and cheese by means of a tariff, especially in view of the export bounties which are being paid by certain countries, including our own Dominions. Here again, as with bacon and hams, our own revenues would benefit from a rise in prices. In the absence of a duty the English consumer will be out of pocket to the foreign exporter. In any case it is surely imperative that bounty-fed imports of cheese and butter to this country should be dutiable to the extent of the bounty they enjoy.

Although centralised control of commodities such as wheat and hops is a practical proposition, I do not see how it can be worked economically in the case of a perishable article like milk, and one which is produced in such large quantities. I fear that the amount of waste will be prodigious, especially during the summer months, and I cannot but wonder upon whom the loss will fall. Let me say once again that I make these remarks in a spirit of the friendliest criticism; I yield to no one in hoping that my fears are groundless, and that success will attend Mr. Elliot's brave and constructive efforts to help our greatest industry.

Let us hope, however, that Mr. Elliot and his successors, and his colleagues present and future in the other departments of State, will be allowed to carry on their work safe from the dangers which beset a single-chamber system of government. The powers of our Upper House are weak, dangerously weak in my opinion, and I sometimes wonder whether the average and, I fear, often apathetic citizen realises how thinly our present constitution is protected against the whims and vagaries of an uncontrolled democracy and its fickle majorities. An effective second chamber, with control over finance, we must have; I care not what it is called or how it is composed, provided its powers of exposing, and if need be, vetoing all defective or ill-digested legislation are real and effective. Mr. Lecky's remarks on the dangers of single-chamber government in Democracy and Liberty are worthy of our attention to-day:—

> "There is one point, however, on which all the best observers in America, whether they admire or dislike > democracy, seem agreed. It is, that it is absolutely essential to its safe working that there should be a written constitution, securing property and contract, placing serious obstacles in the way of organic changes, restricting the power of majorities, and preventing outbursts of mere temporary discontent and mere casual coalitions from overthrowing the main pillars of the State. In America such safeguards are largely and skilfully provided, and to this fact America mainly owes her stability. Unfortunately, in England the men who are doing most to plunge the country into democracy are also the bitter enemies of all these safeguards, by which alone a democratic government can be permanently maintained."

I hope that every one of us who loves his country will read, mark and digest these words. Democracy uncontrolled makes headlong for chaos, and that, in England, means famine as well ; and then, with the eagles refusing to submit to the rule of the parrots, we shall be face to face with those very despotisms and dictatorships which are anathema to Englishmen.

Turning now from the country to the town, from Mr. Elliot to Sir Hilton Young, I am sure that everyone in this room will join with me in congratulating the Minister of Health upon his energy and drive in the matter of slum clearance. He has estimated, from the five-year programmes which have been submitted to his department, that by 1938 over 200,000 houses will have been cleared, and 1,000,000 persons rehoused. He claims that in five years' time the back of the slum dragon will have been broken. No right-thinking citizen, and certainly no chartered surveyor, will wish Sir Hilton Young anything but well in his rôle of St. George.

What are the causes of slums? Bad landlords, dirty and destructive tenants, large working-class families, overcrowding, the wearing out of property, and, for the last 18 years, the Rent Restriction Acts.

Much capital, political and otherwise, has been made out of the bad landlord, but the part he has played in the creation of slums has nevertheless been exaggerated. Neither I, nor, I hope, anyone else, has any sympathy for the landlord who sweats his property, and local authorities have for many years had the power to deal adequately with such persons. But the landlord, and this applies to the majority of owners, who is ready and willing to keep his property in order has not been so faithfully treated by the Legislature. The Rent Restriction Acts have not permitted him to pull down and re-develop when his property is worn out ; and if his property is not worn out he may keep it in decent order, but he still runs the risk of being penalised by the factors of situation and environment, for which he is not responsible.

The injustice of Section 46 of the Housing Act, 1925, has been ventilated by more than one of my predecessors in this Chair, and for that injustice more than one Minister of Health has promised a remedy. Sir Hilton Young himself referred to it at Birmingham last month in his speech on slum clearance to the Conference of Conservative Associations. He promised, if I read his remarks aright, that his administration of the Housing Act of 1930 would provide adequate compensation for property which, though situated in a slum, is in good condition. So far, so good, but fair compensation is not possible under the Housing Statutes as they now stand. The law requires amendment, so that the test whether or not compensation shall be paid on a market value basis shall be made to depend on the condition in which the owner has kept the premises affected and not on their environment.

The present basis of compensation for land acquired compulsorily with a view to clearance operations is, as a legal authority on the Housing Acts has remarked, the only instance in English law in which the amount of compensation is made to depend on the use to which the acquiring authority proposes to put the land. If it is intended as a punishment for the landlord who has permitted his property to fall into bad condition, then it is one of those fortunately rare instances of English law punishing a person without a trial, and without the safeguards which criminal procedure provides for the accused. If it be argued that a fair basis of compensation makes the cost of slum clearance prohibitive, it must be asked, in reply, whether it is right that owners should make a special contribution towards the cost of slum clearance over and above that which they make in common with other citizens.

Injustice and the fear of injustice in this matter has in the past contributed largely to delay the offensive against the slum evil, and there are signs that the inadequacy of some local programmes may be traced to the same cause.

The case of the destructive tenant is difficult to deal with, but I am glad to say that in recent years I have found a notable improvement in the manner in which poor tenants keep their homes. Better education, the adjustment of habit to higher standards of life, sympathetic and enlightened management have, no doubt, contributed much to this state of affairs. The improvement can and should be accentuated by instilling into children while still at school the importance of cleanliness and neatness, and by teaching them the elements of household management.

As to overcrowding, it is a feature, and at the same time a cause of the slum problem. It arises in part from the fact that rents in central districts are too high for the " sub- " merged tenth " class of tenant ; in part from the workman's need to live near his work ; in part also from those Acts which restricted not only rent, but also the landlord's power to deal as he should with the type of statutory tenant who profiteers in the overcrowding business.

The huge number of dwellings which have been built since the War has not at present solved the problem of housing and rehousing the poorest classes. There is still a shortage of Class C dwellings. Overcrowding is at its worst in central areas where the price of land is high and the cost of rehousing prohibitive.

Local authorities have now the power, under the Housing Act, 1930, to make by-laws for the abatement of overcrowding which is so bad as to be injurious to health. The new Rent Restrictions Act removes the necessity of providing alternative accommodation as a condition precedent to an order for possession of an overcrowded house. One can only hope that these and the other powers vested in the authorities will be used and administered in a way which will be effective in mitigating the evil.

There is still, however, the further problem of where the displaced inmates of overcrowded houses are to be put to live. It is a problem to which the best brains in housing administration are hard put to find a solution, and in the more populous centres the crux of it really lies in whether rehousing shall be carried out upwards or outwards. High blocks of tenements in central areas are costly to build, and because of their lack of privacy are disliked by many working-class people. But they rehouse the workman near his work. Rehousing in suburban districts is cheaper, in fact the cost of rehousing a family outside may be as low as 60 per cent. of that of rehousing it inside a central area, but the breadwinners are far removed from their employment, and they have their transport fares to pay. It may be suggested, perhaps, that this could be met by arrangements with the railways and transport undertakings for special fares ; but so long as industry remains inside, the removal outwards of large sections of the inside population must be considered in its bearing upon the already serious and seemingly insoluble problem of traffic congestion.

The ideal solution naturally lies in sweeping both works and workpeople out and away from central areas altogether and placing them in new and well-planned satellite towns. That, however, is at present a counsel of perfection. Industry must first be persuaded to migrate from its present inside habitats, a process which was checked by the Derating Acts, but may now be set in motion again by town planning powers. The practical solution lies, in my opinion, in an intelligent combination of the two methods, decentralisation outwards being used as far as possible, combined, where still necessary on industrial or economic grounds, with the erection in central areas of high tenement blocks with plenty of space for air, sunlight and play-grounds surrounding them.

I will conclude with a few words on domestic matters. The influx of candidates for our examinations in March last was greater than ever before. The numbers for next March are about the same. This is partly due, no doubt, to an increasing recognition of the importance of proper professional qualifications, partly to our policy of encouraging candidates to spread their studies over a longer period by splitting the Intermediate, but mostly, I fear, to the fact that for the last three years the doors of trade and commerce have been closed to large numbers of young men, who are therefore making for the professions. I am told that the same thing is happening with most other professional societies.

We have recently, as you know, held general meetings to approve the insertion in our By-laws of certain provisions which together will constitute a code of conduct for our profession. Before that your Council had been in consultation with the Councils of three other kindred societies— I refer to the Land Agents' Society, the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute, and the Incorporated Society of Auctioneers. I am glad to say that complete agreement was reached between the Councils of these bodies ; and I hope and believe that the members of the latter, like our own, will consent to the necessary alterations in their by-laws and articles of association.

If this is done, the rules of the Joint Code of Conduct, which is substantially the same as the previous Code of this Institution, will govern some 20,000 practitioners. That, as I think you will agree, is a great achievement. It is an earnest of the determination which exists among the best of us surveyors, land agents, valuers and auctioneers to do our duty by our clients and by ourselves, and at the same time to protect our junior members from the evils of unbridled and unscrupulous competition. We intend to raise, and continue raising, our standard of professional ethics, and with it our standing and our estimation in the eyes of the public. I ask the public to help us by treating us as professional men, and not as men governed by other than professional ideals.

Since my predecessor's Opening Address we have lost our late Secretary, Mr. Goddard, who, when I last saw him, was looking remarkably well. He is now living at Northleach in Gloucestershire. His successor, Major Killick, has now been with us a year, and as many of you may have noticed is making a great success of his appointment. His pen, if he will allow me to say so, is no less mighty than was his sword. I should like also to thank Mr. Evans and the other members of the staff of The Institution for the whole-hearted support they have given to the Secretary while learning the intricacies of his heavy and difficult task.

You will think, I am afraid, that I have spoken with the voice of Jeremiah, and I am afraid that to some extent you will be right. I cannot help feeling that the last two verses of the Fifth Chapter of his Book are, with a slight alteration, not inapplicable to the times in which we live:—

> "A wonderful and a horrible thing is committed in this land. The prophets prophesy falsely and the priests bear rule by their means, and my people love to have it so, and what will ye do in the end thereof?"

The slight alteration I will leave to you.

Mr. C. Gerald Eve (Past-President) said he believed it was the custom of The Institution that the immediate Past-President should have the duty of proposing a vote of thanks to the President for his Address. It gave him very great pleasure to do so that evening, because he had known Mr. Tuckett personally for many years. Moreover, a doctor brother of his had been at Cambridge with a doctor brother of Mr. Tuckett, and they both passed their Natural Science Tripos with honours together. He remembered that Mr. Tuckett's brother had an ability and cleverness amounting to genius, and it was no surprise to him, therefore, when he got to know the President to find he had a large share of that ability which had been revealed in the family generally.

It might also be suitable that a life-long protectionist should propose the vote of thanks to a life-long free trader.

Mr. Tuckett was especially known on the Council for his work as Chairman of the Elections Committee, work which required great care and much labour in dealing with many thousands of names. The members generally and the Council in particular were extremely grateful to Mr. Tuckett for the care and right judgment he had shown in that position.

But the attribute of his which probably appealed to them most was his fearlessness in expressing his opinion. That was becoming rather a rare virtue in these days, and personally he thought it was much to be commended. But it was one thing to be fearless in one's opinions, however formed, and another to take great pains in forming one's opinions and then to be fearless in expressing and upholding them. No one, after hearing his Address, could deny that Mr. Tuckett was a profound and original thinker.

A further outstanding attribute of Mr. Tuckett was his technical command of his profession ; he gave most wise counsel in every technical and professional matter as well as in the general walks of life.

The President had covered a very wide field in his Address, and had invited the members to study and think for themselves instead of adopting the opinions of the daily press or of speakers who desired them to adopt their pabulum without inquiry. It was thoroughly sound advice in these days that one should try to study and think for oneself and not adopt second-hand opinions without inquiry. Fortunately it was against the precedent of The Institution to debate or discuss the President's Address, and he was glad to shelter himself behind that precedent, because otherwise he would have had to confess to an entire ignorance of present-day monetary problems. He had tried at times to understand them, and when he read what the great A said, he said to himself " At last I think I do understand " them," but then he read what B said, and found that A was all wrong. He was afraid, therefore, that monetary problems were quite beyond him, and he had given them up a long time ago, except that he had come to the conclusion that real property was a very " good egg," and that the sound man would continue to stick to that. Whatever party was in power in England, a bit of property was not a monetary problem in the same way that other monetary problems were.

He was glad, moreover, that the rule against discussing the Address relieved him from saying whether or not he agreed that " democracy uncontrolled made headlong for " chaos," and from saying whether he agreed about minimum wages for agricultural labourers. He would, however, say that if there was one class of labour for whom the members of The Institution felt not only respect but affection it was the agricultural labourer, and they wished him well in his endeavour to better his lot.

The members would all have been extremely glad to hear the President's commendation of Mr. Walter Elliot, the Minister for Agriculture. Nothing that they could say would be too complimentary for the intelligence and energy with which he was inciting the Government to do something for agriculture. If one did not try one could never succeed, and if any man had tried hard and put brains into his effort it was the Minister for Agriculture.

The President rightly said that the members would welcome the attack which was being made on the slums, but personally, as he had ventured to say at the last Annual Dinner, he believed in the motto " Hurry slowly." He doubted if it was wise to put people into new and better houses except pari passu with employment increasing and their wages being sufficient to prevent the new rent they had to pay from eating into what ought to go into their stomachs. The medical officer of Stockton-on-Tees took the trouble for some years to trace all those who left the slums and went into new houses, and he found statistics showed that their health was worse than when they were in the slums, because rent took up wages which should have been spent in food. While everyone would agree with the President that the slum question must be tackled, he doubted if the fast rate of progress which was anticipated was as sound as slower progress would be. However, he reminded himself that, however fast progress was intended to be, there was always a drag on everything, and it might be that by inspiring people to do 120 per cent. one would arrive at the 100 per cent. rate of progress which was sought.

If ever there was an iniquity in a statute it was Section 46 of the Housing Act of 1925. He remembered attending a deputation from The Institution to the then Minister of Health, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, who agreed that it was unfair, and that fresh legislation should be passed when the time of Parliament permitted. That was seven or eight years ago, and he could not help feeling that in the interval some moment of Parliamentary time might have been devoted to that amendment. He hoped the Council of The Institution would take special note of that part of the President's Address, and would, again, seriously urge that something should be done, because if the small owners affected were to be disposssessed and robbed of their life's savings, it was time for the Council to move ; and, even if their action had no result, they could at any rate express their indignation at what he thought was a blot on the Statute Book.

It gave him the greatest possible pleasure to propose a vote of thanks to the President for his able and thoughtful Address, and to say how much it had been appreciated by the members present.

Sir George Courthope (Associate) said he felt it a great privilege and pleasure to be allowed to second the vote of thanks which had been proposed so delightfully by Mr. Gerald Eve.

The President had given an interesting and challenging survey of many of the difficulties which were encountered in everyday national life. He then went on to sigh for the good old days, when master and man, producer and consumer, could strike their bargain without the interference of the law or of regulations or trade unions or marketing boards. Many, no doubt, would share that feeling. Finally, towards the end of the Address, the President tried to make the members believe that he was a pessimist, and even brought in the prophet Jeremiah to assist him in inducing them to accept so gross a fallacy. If one turned over a few more pages, however, one would find that same prophet asking his readers the question " Can the " Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots?" He believed not ; but both those things would be relatively easy compared with the task of making the President anything but a cheerful optimist.

To return to the survey of world conditions to-day which the President had made, he would ask the members for a moment to place that survey, with the greater part of which he agreed absolutely, in an even larger picture. The President's survey was mainly a domestic one, but, placed in the international picture, what did one find? One found that we were living in a world where " the old order " changeth, yielding place to new." In some parts of the world it had changed with terrible abruptness, leading to equally terrible chaos ; in other parts it had brought about complete financial collapse and many other evils. Wherever one looked among the countries of the world, possibly with one or two minor exceptions, one found such a state of things that one brought one's mind back to conditions in this country with positive relief and said " Thank God I am " a Briton."

This was a time when all the old economic rules had been abandoned by every honest economist. One of the greatest living economists—it would not be fair to mention his name—had said to him recently " You know, it is very " hard on us economists, or men who are supposed to be " economists ; we have had to drop all our old shibboleths, and we have nothing else to lecture about except the mis-" takes that the rest of us are making." He added there was one exception—again it would not be fair to mention the name—whom nobody had to contradict because he contradicted himself in every speech he made.

All the old relations of production and consumption, of supply and demand, of currency and commodities, had collapsed, and the statesmen, bankers, economists and other leading men were groping for new rules which they could apply to modern conditions. And yet, in this state of extraordinary confusion, when crowns were falling and governments changing with kaleidoscopic rapidity, Old England went calmly one, and in quite a short time had recovered beyond all question the financial and commercial supremacy of the world, which many people thought she had lost never to regain. It was hers ; she retained it in spite of the confusion. While by all the measuring rods which could be applied one nation after another was still descending the scale of misery and difficulty, this country alone was steadily going up. Most people were now actively and personally conscious of it ; they felt it in their business, and they knew that their neighbours felt it in their hearts, which was, perhaps, the most important thing of all in a country's recovery. Employment was better ; the export trade was better ; everything was better, in spite of the fact that the people of this country were still bearing with relative cheerfulness a load of taxation, local and imperial, which no other country in the world would tolerate for one moment. It was probably because they were doing it cheerfully that they were getting on so well ; it was probably because, in spite of their love for individual liberty and freedom, they were taking so cheerfully the various schemes of industrial reorganisation, marketing orders, and things of that kind, that they were overcoming the difficulties which they, in common with the rest of the world, had been facing since the War.

Reconstruction was going on, and quickly. There would be a bigger call for reconstruction as people felt the movement towards recovery, and he believed The Institution would have a large part to play in guiding that reconstruction, so far at all events as real property in town and country was concerned. They had reason to feel proud of their country and themselves, and confident of its future and theirs. They would go on both as a country and as individuals quietly doing their job, facing their difficulties with courage and helping others over theirs as opportunities arose.

For such a programme there could be no better leader than their President. He knew of no man, in a very wide acquaintance, who did his job better and faced his difficulties and his problems more cheerfully, and more gladly helped others, than did Mr. Tuckett, to whom he had great pleasure in seconding the vote of thanks for his Address.

The vote of thanks was then put by Mr. C. GERALD EVE, and carried by acclamation.

The PRESIDENT, in reply, said that the kind things which Mr. Gerald Eve and Sir George Courthope had said about him were entirely undeserved. All he could say was that he had done his best. He would like to thank all those present very much for the way in which they had received what was intended to be a very aggressive Address.

The meeting then terminated.

THE LAW RELATING TO THE SUPPLY OF ELECTRICITY.

By H. F. Bidder (Associate), Barrister-at-Law.

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Chartered Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 4th December, 1933.

Electricity may be supplied to consumers without authorisation of any kind with the same freedom as any other commodity. Electricity, however, shares with gas and water this distinction, that whereas other commodities can be delivered to the consumer by ordinary road transport, electricity requires for its delivery a permanent line to the consumer's door. It is often possible to construct this line along the public roads by arrangement with the road authorities, but such an arrangement is not a satisfactory one. The licence may be withdrawn: and in any case the road authority can give no rights as against the general public using the road or as against the owner of the subsoil. Hence, as in the case of gas and water, Parliamentary powers are sought by those who desire to supply electricity within any particular area, whereby they get the right to construct their transmission system along the roads of the area. In return for this right they are placed under various obligations as to the supply of electricity ; and are authorised to supply for all, or for selected, purposes. Local authorities, companies or persons who are thus authorised to supply electricity in any area are called authorised undertakers, and may be either authorised distributors or power companies. Authorised distributors may (and under certain conditions must) supply electricity within their area for all purposes: power companies only for limited purposes, such as for power or for the supply in bulk to authorised distributors.

These terms are defined in Section 36 of the Electricity

(Supply) Act, 1919. Since then Parliament has created a type of undertakers who combine the characteristics both of distributors and of power companies. Such undertakers are given very large areas over part of which they must supply electricity for all purposes, and as to the remainder of which they must bring up proposals for electrical development from time to time. Examples of such companies are the Wessex Company and the East Anglian Company.

I said that electricity might be supplied to consumers without authorisation. That must be qualified, since 1909, by the prohibition in the Electric Lighting Act of that year against any person commencing to supply electricity in the area of any authorised undertakers. This, however, does not apply to any person whose business is not primarily the supply of electricity to consumers.

The subject of this Paper is the law relating to the supply of electricity under statutory powers.

THE ELECTRICITY (SUPPLY) ACTS.

The statute law relating to the supply of electricity is contained in the Electricity (Supply) Acts, 1882 to 1933, which are to be read as one Act ; of these, the Acts previous to 1919 were entitled Electric Lighting Acts. In addition to these general provisions, the special Act or Statutory Order under which undertakers obtain powers contains provisions applicable to the particular case, which include since 1899 those in the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act of that year, unless excepted by the special Act or Order. Undertakers are further subject to regulations made from time to time by the Electricity Commissioners for certain purposes defined by statute.

The Electricity (Supply) Acts do more than contain the code governing the undertakers who supply electricity under statutory authority. The first Act, the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, empowered the Board of Trade to authorise the supply of electricity by Provisional Orders which when confirmed by Parliament had statutory force: and the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, transferred the powers of the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts to the Minister of Transport, and (as regards Provisional Orders) to the Electricity Commissioners set up by the Act. The Minister is enabled by the Act to delegate to the Electricity Commissioners any of the powers transferred to him, and most of these powers have been so delegated. The Commissioners are solely responsible to the Minister, and act under his general directions. The Act of 1919 also provided machinery for the organisation of the sources of supply of electricity and the development of its distribution by empowering the Electricity Commissioners to group areas into electricity districts for which Joint Electricity Authorities might be created. The Electricity (Supply) Act, 1926, set up the Central Electricity Board for the organisation of the generation of electricity and its transmission and supply to authorised undertakers throughout Great Britain.

HISTORY OF THE ELECTRIC LIGHTING ACT, 1882.

The Electric Lighting Act, 1882, contains the foundations upon which the position of electrical undertakers has been developed ; and it is easier to understand its form and purpose if one examines the circumstances under which it was passed.

In 1873 the first public electric light had been installed in London, namely, the arc light which illuminated the face of Big Ben. In 1878 the Thames Embankment was lit by arc lights which required one generator to every 20 lights. In 1879 a Select Committee of the House of Commons was appointed to consider the advisability of legislating with regard to the supply of electric light. They reported that no legislation was yet necessary: the time had not come to give general powers to private electric companies to break up streets. If, however, local authorities had not powers to break up their streets for the purpose of public electric lighting, as to which doubts had been suggested, these powers should be conferred. They found that "in large "establishments the motors necessary to produce the "electric light may readily be provided: but so far as we "have received evidence no system of central origin and "distribution suitable to houses of moderate size has "hitherto been established." Their proceedings make interesting reading. Tyndall was the first witness ; and he was followed by Siemens, Preece, Hopkinson, Thomson, and others. These eminent scientists and electricians agreed that the only way to apply electricity to lighting economically was to have arc lights of large power, supplied by one generator to each light. The loss of light by subdivision, they said, was enormous: five lights on one generator only gave 1/25th of the illumination that could be obtained from a single light. Edison was believed to be experimenting to produce light by the ignition of platinum wire ; but the waste of electricity would be inordinate with a continuous conductor. Only one bold Frenchman claimed in his evidence that his company could sub-divide electric light without loss.

In the next two years the use of electric light for street lighting, shops, public buildings and railway stations increased. A few municipalities got Acts authorising them to use electricity for public lamps. There was a boom in electricity companies, which were companies for the exploitation of particular patents for electrical apparatus. The incandescent lamp came in, and the Savoy Theatre was lit on that system in 1882. In that year a number of Private Bills were promoted, some by electricity companies asking for universal powers of supply, some by gas companies or municipalities asking for powers of supply within their areas. These were held up while the Electric Lighting Bill was introduced by the Board of Trade, then under the presidency of Mr. Chamberlain. The principal electricity companies actively supported the Bill, appearing by Counsel through the Committee stage. One company announced its readiness to apply at once for ninety-five Provisional Orders.

The object of the Bill was to provide a simple and inexpensive procedure by Provisional Order whereby powers to break up streets for the purpose of electric supply could be obtained: and at the same time to define some of the conditions that should be imposed upon undertakers. It was stated that electric supply was still in the experimental stage, so that a complete code could not be put in the Bill ; but the Board of Trade would be able to complete the code by inserting regulations in the Orders they made. The Board of Trade were empowered to license experimental supplies for a short term of years without confirmation by Parliament, but with the consent of the local authority.

In the development of the supply of gas and water under statutory powers, the first stage had been the authorisation of particular undertakings by private Acts. The clauses usually inserted in such Acts were collected in the Waterworks Clauses Act and Gasworks Clauses Act into a form which could conveniently be applied to particular undertakings by incorporation in private Acts to be subsequently passed. These Clauses Acts are, therefore, in their nature portions of private Acts and are intended to relate to individual undertakings. When in 1870 Provisional Order procedure was instituted for obtaining gas and water powers by the Gas and Waterworks Facilities Act of that year, it was provided that the existing Clauses Acts should normally be incorporated in the Orders made.

In 1882 there was, of course, no Clauses Act in existence in regard to electric supply. The Electric Lighting Act of that year, is, therefore, in its essence a short Clauses Act, to be expanded by regulations of the Board of Trade, and incorporating considerable portions of the Gasworks Clauses Acts ; combined with a " Facilities " Act empowering the Board of Trade to make Provisional Orders authorising the supply of electricity.

The result has not been altogether happy. Functioning as a Clauses Act, the Act of 1882 enacts (Section 2) that its provisions shall apply to all bodies to be authorised by Act or Order to supply electricity within any area. All the other Electricity Supply Acts are general Acts, not Clauses Acts ; they are not confined to dealing with electrical undertakers, and they contain in themselves their operative force and define their own application ; yet since the Electricity (Supply) Acts are to be read as one, this section would appear to " apply " the later Acts to electrical undertakers ; and in the Electric Lighting Act of 1909 " undertakers " are defined as " any local authority, company, or person " authorised to supply electricity to whom the Electric " Lighting Acts apply."

ELECTRIC LIGHTING (CLAUSES) ACT, 1899.

In course of time regulations inserted in Provisional Orders by the Board of Trade became settled in form ; and in 1899 most of them were set out in the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act of that year, and were applied (unless varied) to all undertakers to be subsequently authorised by Act or Order to supply electricity in any area except London. This Act completed the " Clauses Act " side of the Act of 1882; but it is not one of the Electricity (Supply) Acts. It provides, with the Act of 1882, the fundamental code for electrical undertakers to-day.

PURCHASE BY LOCAL AUTHORITIES.

The Committee reporting in 1879 had recommended that no permanent monopoly should be conferred on undertakers for the supply of electricity, as had been the case with gas and water, but that powers to purchase the undertaking after a period of years should be granted to the local authority on the analogy of the Tramways Act, 1870. Section 27 was accordingly inserted in the Act of 1882 giving this power. Hopes were high, and a period of 15 years was at first fixed as sufficient to recoup undertakers, a period lengthened before the Act was passed to 21 years. This did not, in fact, prove long enough to attract the investment of capital ; and little progress was made till the period was extended by the Electric Lighting Act, 1888, to 42 years.

UNDERTAKERS AUTHORISED TO SUPPLY WITHIN A DEFINED AREA.

The undertakers dealt with in the Electricity (Supply) Acts are limited by definition to undertakers who have been authorised by Act of Parliament or Statutory Order to supply electricity within any area. They are prohibited by Section 4 of the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, from supplying electricity outside their area otherwise than under the authority of Parliament. It would appear, however, that a supply taken inside the area may be used outside it, where the premises of the consumer are situated partly within and partly without the area. This is the effect of the decision in A. G. v. County of London Electric Supply Company, Ltd., [1926] Ch. 542, where a supply was delivered upon a part of industrial premises which were in the area of the supplying authority, but was mostly used on other parts of the premises that were in the area of an adjoining authority.

UNDERTAKERS AND THE PUBLIC.

The members of this Institution will be more interested in the relations of authorised undertakers to the general public than in a discussion of their internal constitution and their relations to each other. I propose, therefore, to describe shortly the rights and duties of authorised undertakers with regard to the property, requirements and liberties of the public at large and of individuals in their area.

(A).—RIGHTS IN RELATION TO PROPERTY.

1. Power to break up streets.

Authorised undertakers may for the purpose of laying their lines open and break up any street or bridge within their area of supply. This power is derived from Section 6 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847, one of the sections incorporated with the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, and, therefore, applying to all authorised undertakers. And "street" here has the widest possible meaning, and can include roads, lanes, footpaths, and alleys of any sort. But the power, first given in such general terms, is afterwards greatly restricted. By Section 7 of the Gasworks Clauses

Act the undertakers are prohibited from interfering with buildings or with land not dedicated to public use without the consent of the owners and occupiers thereof: and the Electric Lighting Act, 1882 (Section 13) further prohibits them from breaking up any street not repairable by the local authority without the consent of those responsible for repairing it, unless they are specially authorised by their Act or Order to do so, or obtain the consent of the Electricity Commissioners. Such authorisation or consent can only apply to streets dedicated to the public use. The provision of the Act of 1882 is expanded in Section 12 of the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899.

It is somewhat anomalous that in the definition of "local "authority" in the Act of 1882, as regards England, a county council is not included. Authorised undertakers have therefore no right to break up roads repairable by a county council without obtaining either the consent of the council or, in the event of a refusal, the consent of the Electricity Commissioners. Since the passing of the Local Government Act, 1929, the proportion of the roads in this country repairable by county councils has greatly increased and the powers of authorised undertakers in regard to them have been restricted accordingly.

Where a street is dedicated to the public but is not repairable by any person, the undertakers cannot break it up, there being no one whose consent can be obtained (Andrews v. Abertillery U.D.C., [1911] 2 Ch. 398).

A general power to break up streets laid out or made, but not yet dedicated to the public, is sometimes included in Special Acts. Such a general power cannot be conferred by Order.

In any case where lines are to be laid in a street not repairable by the local authority notice must be given to the persons liable to repair the street, who may elect to do the work at the expense of the authorised undertakers. Sections 13 to 16 of the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, amplify Section 13 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, on these matters.

2. Power to place lines across private property.

Until 1919 authorised undertakers had no right to lay lines upon private property without the consent of the owners. But in the Electricity (Supply) Act of that year a big inroad was made upon this principle. In order to facilitate the construction of transmission lines it was enacted (Section 22) that electric lines might be placed by authorised undertakers across any land with the consent of the Minister of Transport. The lines may be above ground or below ground ; save that in the case of overhead lines there is no power to place them across land covered by buildings, or used as a garden or pleasure ground. The Minister may give his consent after hearing all parties concerned, and may attach to it such terms as he thinks just ; and he is to have regard to the effect upon the amenities or value of the land of the placing of the lines in the manner proposed. It is under these powers that the " Grid " has been spread across the country.

The side-note to this section is the word " Wayleaves " ; and wayleaves these rights are usually called. It seems a very inappropriate term. A " wayleave " is a licence to pass over another person's property: the construction of a transmission line involves the occupation of part of the property to the exclusion of the owner.

This section and its effect were exhaustively discussed in the case of West Midlands Joint Electricity Authority v. Pitt, [1932] 2 K.B. 1. In that case the authority had obtained the consent of the Minister of Transport to the erection upon private land of steel towers which were to carry transmission lines. These towers were erected on concrete foundations 14 to 25 feet square. The Minister, in giving his consent after a local enquiry had been held, decided, as one of the terms upon which his consent was given, the amount of compensation that was to be paid to the landowner. The landowner claimed that this was beyond the Minister's powers, and that he was entitled to have the amount of pecuniary compensation due to him settled by arbitration. The Court of Appeal, confirming the judgment of the Court below, decided that compensation for the execution (but not the user) of the works could be claimed under Section 17 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, and the amount determined by arbitration ; and that the powers of the Minister to determine the terms on which he should give his consent to a wayleave did not include the power to determine the pecuniary compensation payable to the landowner.

The Joint Electricity Authority being a public authority within the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, the compensation was in this case to be determined by arbitration under that Act. Where the authorised undertakers are not a public authority, the compensation will be determined by an arbitrator appointed by the Minister of Transport under Section 28 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882.

Although the Minister may not determine the amount of pecuniary compensation payable, he may decide all the other terms, as between the landowner and the undertakers, upon which the lines are to be constructed.

3. Lopping of trees and hedges.

Under Section 34 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1926, authorised undertakers may give notice to the owner or occupier of land requiring him to lop or cut any tree or hedge upon the land that obstructs or interferes or will interfere with the construction, maintenance or working of any electric line, subject to payment of reasonable expenses; and may carry out the work themselves if not done within twenty-one days. Where notice is served on the occupier, a copy must be served on the owner. The owner or occupier may give a counter notice of objection, when the matter is to be referred to the Minister of Transport, who may make such order as he thinks just, after giving the parties an opportunity to be heard, and may determine any question as to what compensation (if any) and expenses are to be paid. The undertakers are to secure that trees and hedges shall be lopped or cut in a woodmanlike manner and so as to do as little damage as may be to trees, fences, hedges and growing crops, and shall cause the boughs lopped to be removed in accordance with the direction of the owner or occupier, and shall make good any damage done to the land. This section applies to the felling as well as the lopping of trees.

The word " woodmanlike " is used here for the first time in legislation.

4. Abstraction of water for condensing purposes.

The Minister of Transport may by Order (on the representation of the Electricity Commissioners) authorise the abstraction of water by authorised undertakers from any river or other source. Notice must be given and objections heard. Ninety-five per cent. at least of the water must be returned at a temperature to be fixed by the Order so as to avoid injury to public health, fisheries, or industry (Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, Section 15). The reservoirs of statutory water undertakers are excepted by an amendment scheduled to the Act of 1926.

5. Liability of authorised undertakers for nuisance.

With the increase in the size of generating stations, and the consequent risk of injury to the neighbourhood by unconsumed gases, the question of liability for nuisance has become prominent.

The general law with regard to nuisance need not be examined now. It may be said broadly that a private individual has his remedy in the case of an infringement of public right which does him special damage, and in the case of an act done in his vicinity which deprives him in some way of the proper enjoyment of his land.

But where Parliament has authorised the doing of some act (such as the working of a specified railway or the generation of electricity at a specified station) no action will lie in respect of damage caused by doing that act, so long as it is done without negligence. And it is negligence not to make use of all reasonably available methods to prevent the damage.

Applying these principles to electric undertakings, it seems probable that in any case undertakers would be liable for nuisance caused by works which, although authorised in the sense of being constructed under the undertakers' general powers, are not specifically authorised by description in an Act or Order. This was the opinion expressed by Lord Halsbury in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Company, [1895] 1 Ch., at page 309. But for the greater part of the electric undertakings of the country that question does not arise, as Section 81 of the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, is usually incorporated in the Act or Order authorising the undertaking, and provides that " nothing in the [Act or] " Order shall exonerate the undertakers from any indict- " ment, action or other proceeding for nuisance, in the event " of any nuisance being caused or permitted by them."

But it will often be found that this section has been excluded when a specific generating station was authorised ; and from some Acts authorising the supply of electricity it has been excluded altogether. An example is the East Anglian Electricity Act, 1927. Where a generating station has been specifically authorised, and Section 81 of the Schedule to the Clauses Act does not apply, the undertakers will only be liable for nuisance if they are guilty of negligence in the sense described above.

The question of what constitutes negligence, so as to render a statutory generating station liable for nuisance caused by it, was discussed at length in the case of Farnworth v. Manchester Corporation, [1930] A.C. 171. In that case the construction of the generating station had been authorised by Act of Parliament, and Section 81 of the Schedule to the Clauses Act did not apply to it. There was, therefore, no remedy for persons suffering from nuisance caused by it unless the station was worked negligently. Considerable damage was done by fumes from the station to the crops of a neighbouring farmer, who brought an action claiming an injunction and damages. It was held that he was entitled to both, though the injunction would be suspended while steps were being taken to abate the nuisance. The Court of Appeal took the view that the burden of proof was upon the owners of the station (the Manchester Corporation) to show that they had taken all reasonable precautions to prevent the nuisance ; and that they had not discharged this burden.

(B).—RIGHT OF THE PUBLIC TO OBTAIN A SUPPLY OF ELECTRICITY.

As already mentioned, the class of undertakers who may, and under certain conditions must, provide a supply of electricity for all purposes are those described as authorised distributors. The right of the public to demand a supply arises in the following manner.

1. Obligation upon authorised distributors to construct distributing mains.

Distributing mains for the purpose of general supply must be laid down by the undertakers along such streets as may be specified in the Act or Order under which they get their powers. They must also construct distributing mains along any street when requisitioned to do so as provided in Sections 24 and 25 of the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899. The requisition may be made by six or more owners or occupiers of premises in the street, who must guarantee the taking of such a supply of electricity for three years at the least as will produce 20 per cent. upon the expense incurred. The Electricity Commissioners may, however, determine the requisition to be unreasonable.

A very large proportion of the distributing mains of the country have, of course, been constructed by distributors in the ordinary course of development in order to obtain business.

2. Obligation to provide a supply from distributing mains.

When a distributing main is constructed, it confers the right upon all owners and occupiers of premises situate within 50 yards of it to demand a supply of electricity. The undertakers must lay the necessary lines, but the consumer can be required to pay for all work more than 60 feet from the main. To become entitled to the supply he must serve notice on the undertakers specifying his premises, the maximum supply required, and a reasonable date for commencement. If the undertakers require it (which they seldom do), he must enter into a written contract to take and pay for a supply for at least two years so as to return 20 per cent. per annum on the outlay incurred ; and he may be required to give security. When he has done these things he is entitled to be supplied with electricity up to the maximum he has stated. These conditions are contained in Section 27 of the Schedule to the Clauses Act.

There is no limit to the maximum he may demand except what may reasonably be anticipated as the maximum consumption on his premises (Section 28 of the Schedule). Although it has been held that once the energy has been supplied he may use it outside the undertakers' area, it does not necessarily follow that he can demand a supply for use outside that area (see A. G. v. County of London Electricity Supply, Ltd., [1926] 1 Ch. 542; and particularly the remarks of Tomlin, J., at page 558).

Since the applicant may be required to pay 20 per cent. per annum for two years on the outlay incurred in providing any electric lines required for the supply, he cannot demand more than the main is suitable to carry without the risk of incurring a considerable liability.

3. Price of supply.

There remains the question of price. The undertakers can fix the price of any supply which they are compelled to give, subject to two limitations:—

(1) The price must be within the maximum prescribed in the Act or Order (Section 32 of the Schedule to the Clauses Act).

(2) There must be no undue preference. In any part of the area where a supply is provided for private purposes the terms of supply must be the same for corresponding supplies under similar circumstances. This is provided by Sections 19 and 20 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882.

In practice it may, however, be difficult to prove that one supply corresponds to another, and that the circumstances are similar. Distinctions can often be indicated (such as the magnitude of the supply, or the times at which it is taken) which negative the right of others to the same terms.

The method of charge must be one authorised by the Act or Order, or approved by the Minister of Transport. Where the Minister approves a method of charge, he may approve a maximum for that method. The undertakers and the consumer may also agree a method of charge and price within the limits of price imposed by the Act or Order (Sections 31 to 33 of the Schedule to the Clauses Act, and Section 20 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882).

Where a supply is required for stand-by purposes only, the undertakers are entitled to demand a minimum annual payment, to be determined by arbitration if necessary, which will give them a reasonable return on the capital expenses and other standing charges involved (Electricity (Supply) Act, 1922, Section 23).

4. Continuity of supply.

Section 27 of the Schedule to the Clauses Act provides that " Undertakers shall upon being required to do so give " and continue to give a supply " to persons who demand it as provided in the section. A statutory consumer (that is one who takes his supply in pursuance of the rights conferred upon him, and not under a special agreement) is thus entitled to a continuous supply of electricity ; and by Section 30 the undertakers are liable to a daily penalty of forty shillings when they make default in supply to such a consumer, who cannot recover damages.

The undertakers are not entitled to cut off the supply of a statutory consumer except when he is in arrears, or when he does not give such security for payment as may have been required, or when he deals with the electricity supplied so as to interfere unduly with the supply to others. They may, however, refuse to supply a person in respect of one set of premises where his payments for the supply to another set of premises are in arrears. And they cannot be compelled to give a supply to any premises unless satisfied that the wiring and apparatus therein is in good order. See Section 21 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882 ; Section 18 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1909 ; and Section 27 of the Schedule to the Clauses Act.

The regulations of the Electricity Commissioners provide that the undertakers shall maintain a constant and sufficient supply in any distributing main, and provide penalties for default.

5. Character of supply to be provided.

The undertakers are compelled to fulfil certain conditions as to the character of supply they provide.

(i) System of supply (continuous or alternating current).

The supply must be given only by means of some system approved in writing by the Electricity Commissioners. This is a condition imposed upon the undertakers by Section 10 of the Schedule to the Clauses Act.

If, therefore, the Commissioners (or their predecessors, the Board of Trade) have approved a system of supply by direct (i.e., continuous) current, the undertakers may not supply by alternating current unless they obtain the approval of the Commissioners to the change. In giving their approval it is the practice of the Commissioners to impose conditions as to the replacement of consumers' apparatus of a character only suitable for the one type of current by apparatus suitable for the other. Any claim of a consumer to have his apparatus changed or modified depends upon the actual terms of the Commissioners' approval.

The form of approval usually provides that the undertakers shall adapt consumers' apparatus actually in use so as to be available for use under the new system. Thus in a case heard before Goddard, J., it was held that the undertakers (the Chester Corporation) were, under the terms of the Commissioners' approval, bound to instal apparatus for a garage proprietor that would enable him to charge accumulators when the system of supply was changed to alternating current, as he had been doing from the direct current supply (Lakeman v. Chester Corporation (1933), 31 L. G. R. 196).

Under this form of approval it would seem that the undertakers are liable to adapt or replace all apparatus actually in use by consumers and not suitable for employment with the new system.

(ii) Pressure and frequency.

The supply must be in accordance with the regulations of the Electricity Commissioners applicable to the undertaking. These include regulations dealing with the pressure at which the supply must be maintained, and (in the case of alternating current) its frequency. Failure to comply with the regulations gives the consumer a right to proceed for the penalties prescribed in the regulations, but, in the absence of a special contract, the consumer has no right to recover damages. Where a statutory duty is imposed and made enforceable by penalties, an individual suffering from a breach of the duty must proceed under the statute. Thus in Stevens v. Aldershot Gas, Water and District Lighting Company (1932), 31 L. G. R. 48, it was held by Macnaghten, J., that a hairdresser, being a " statutory " consumer without special contract, could not recover damages where his apparatus had been rendered unworkable through failure of pressure.

6. Supplies under special agreement.

So far we have dealt with the case of a consumer who takes a supply under the conditions laid down in the statutes and regulations for persons entitled to demand a supply, who has been called a "statutory consumer." The relations of such a consumer with the undertakers may include some measure of agreement, for instance as to price, without displacing the statutory conditions.

It is also open to the undertakers to enter into a contract with a consumer governing any or all the terms of supply, subject, of course, to the statutory limitations upon the undertakers' powers. The power to enter into contracts for the purpose of supplying electricity is among those conferred by Section 10 of the Act of 1882.

In the case of a consumer who is too far from a distributing main to be able to demand a supply, the terms must of necessity be founded on contract.

As already indicated, the difference becomes important when there is a question of compensation for damage caused to a consumer through failure of supply or of pressure. In the case of a statutory consumer no compensation can be claimed where statutory penalties are provided, nor, on general principles, where the consumer is affected in the same manner as the general body of consumers. In the case of a supply based on contract the consumer's rights depend upon the terms of the contract, unless the statute clearly provides otherwise. The distinction may best be appreciated by comparing two decided cases.

In Clegg Parkinson & Company v. Earby Gas Company, [1896] 1 Q.B. 592, the plaintiffs were taking a supply of gas from authorised gas undertakers under their statutory rights. There was no written or express agreement between the parties.

The undertakers were liable to a penalty on a default in supply, under a section of one of the Gasworks Clauses Acts somewhat similar to Section 30 of the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899. The gas supply failed, and the consumers brought an action to recover compensation for the damage they had suffered.

It was held that the action was not maintainable, as the only remedy open to the plaintiffs was that provided by the statute. Wills, J., in his judgment expressed the opinion that, even had there been no penalty provided, no action would lie if the plaintiffs were affected in like manner to the general body of consumers, though in a different degree. Wright, J., said: " The obligation of the company, if any, " depends upon statute, and not upon contract. The " general rule of law is that, where a general obligation is " created by statute and a specific remedy is provided, that " statutory remedy is the only remedy."

The other case is Morris & Bastert, Ltd., v. Loughborough Corporation, [1908] 1 K.B. 205. There the plaintiffs were taking a supply of electricity from authorised distributors. They were not within 50 yards of a distributing main, and so were not entitled to demand a supply, but had entered into an agreement with the Corporation for this purpose. The supply failed, and the consumers brought an action for damages for breach of contract. The Act under which the Corporation supplied electricity contained a section in the words of Section 30 (1) of the Schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, which provided penalties for default in supply to any person entitled to demand it. It was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover damages for breach of contract, as the words of the penalty clause did not apply to persons who could not demand a supply, but only to persons to whom the undertakers " may be and are required to supply energy." The power to contract was conferred by statute and " where " in a statute contractual rights are given to persons, clear " words are required in the statute in order to place a " limitation upon those contractual rights " (per Lord Alverstone, C.J., at page 215).

7. Supply by undertakers other than authorised distributors.

These are either power companies or undertakers to whom large areas have been given with a view to the eventual development of distribution systems throughout the areas.

Power companies are (generally) prohibited from supplying except to authorised distributors or to individuals for power. The obligations to construct distributing mains and to supply from them are, therefore, not imposed upon them. They must supply, when requisitioned, for the purposes defined in their Acts, upon arbitration terms.

Companies with large areas, over part of which they are distributors, and over part of which they are not, have been called "hybrid companies." Where they are not distributors they usually have the powers and obligations of power companies with the addition of a power (but not an obligation) to supply for light. They are bound to bring up periodically proposals for developing their distribution system.

(C).—RESTRICTIONS IMPOSED BY THE ELECTRICITY (SUPPLY) ACTS UPON UNAUTHORISED SUPPLIES.

1. Authorised undertakers' monopoly.

As already stated, it was open until 1909 to any person to compete with authorised undertakers in the supply of electricity within the undertakers' area, subject, of course, to the disadvantage of not possessing statutory powers to use the roads for transmission lines.

By Section 23 of the Electric Lighting Act of that year it was made unlawful for any person to commence to supply or distribute electricity within an area in which undertakers had been authorised to supply electricity.

There is, however, a very important exception made in the case of persons whose business is not primarily that of the supply of electrical energy to consumers. The section is not to prevent such persons from affording a supply to others.

This section was considered in the case of Caerphilly U.D.C. v. Griffin, [1928] Ch. 171. The owner of a drapery stores was also developing adjoining land owned by him ; and he provided electricity for use in his stores, in a market on his land, and in his tenants' houses. It was held by Russell, J., that his business was not primarily that of the supply of electrical energy to consumers within this section, but was a matter ancillary to his position as a drapery stores owner, and as an owner of property which he wished to develop.

2. Control of lines used for the purpose of supplying electricity.

Where electricity is supplied by persons who are not authorised undertakers, the lines used for the purpose of supply are subject to regulations made in respect of them by the Electricity Commissioners, as provided in Section 4 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1888.

3. Restrictions upon the establishment of new generating stations.

Since the passing of the Act of 1919 no existing generating station may be extended or new generating station established without the consent of the Electricity Commissioners ; but this does not apply to private generating stations (see Section 11 of the Act). A private generating station is defined in Section 36 of that Act, and includes a station generating electricity for use mainly on the owner's premises or for the purposes of his undertaking. Where, however, a new private generating station is established, it must comply with any regulations of the Electricity Commissioners as to type of current, frequency and pressure to be used ; but these regulations must not interfere with the economical and efficient working of the business.

(D).—JOINT ELECTRICITY AUTHORITIES.

As pointed out earlier in this Paper, the first application of electricity was almost entirely for lighting purposes. Further, high-pressure transmission over long distances was unknown, and electricity was necessarily generated in the neighbourhood of the consumers. The area of supply was thus an independent unit both for generation and distribution.

By 1900 it had become possible to transmit electricity in large quantities at high pressure over lines of reasonable dimensions; it had also become evident that a large demand for electricity at a low price for industrial purposes would develop. The existing electric lighting undertakings were not equipped to meet this demand; and power companies came into being, with the object of generating centrally and transmitting in bulk over large areas, as well as supplying individual consumers for power.

In the opening years of this century the industrial use of electricity greatly increased, an increase intensified during the years of war; and reorganisation of the sources of supply became clearly necessary, on account of the number, diversity and unrelated nature of the existing generating stations, and the partial character of electrical development. The Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, was the first attempt to introduce ordered progress on a large scale.

The principle adopted was the division of the country by the Electricity Commissioners into large units called "electricity districts," in which the generation and supply of electricity might be organised by a Joint Electricity Authority for the district created by order of the Commissioners. The authority was to be composed of representatives of the authorised undertakers, the local authorities and other interests in the district ; and by acquiring or constructing generating stations and transmission lines, entering into arrangements with existing undertakers, and themselves distributing to consumers where necessary, the authority was, in the words of the Act, to "secure the "provision of a cheap and abundant supply of electricity "within their district." By the linking up of existing generating stations, the closing down of obsolete or redundant ones and the erection of new stations where required, it was hoped that the costs of generation would be reduced.

A Joint Electricity Authority was given no compulsory powers for the accomplishment of its objects (as had originally been intended), and this fact prevented any considerable reorganisation taking place as a consequence of the Act. Only four Joint Electricity Authorities have been constituted, and in four other electricity districts an Advisory Board or Committee has been set up.

(E).—THE CENTRAL ELECTRICITY BOARD.

The Electricity (Supply) Act, 1926, set up the Central Electricity Board to organise the generation of electricity over the country as a whole. The Board are appointed by but are not responsible to the Minister of Transport. The duty of the Board is to provide supplies for authorised undertakers. Normally the Board neither operate nor own generating stations ; but they have power, by the adoption of schemes for particular areas, to select those existing stations from which, together with new stations to be constructed, the supplies of the country shall be drawn. These stations (called " selected stations ") are to be operated by the owners on behalf of the Board, who will purchase all the electricity generated and sell it again to authorised undertakers, including those operating the stations. Schemes have been adopted by the Board covering the whole of Great Britain. The network of high-pressure transmission lines, known as the " Grid," has been constructed by the Board to link up the selected stations and provide for the distribution in bulk of electricity at high pressure. The electricity cannot reach the consumer without systems of regional transmission at lower pressure and systems for distributing the electricity to consumers at a pressure at which they can take it.

It is hoped that the price at which the Board will be able to supply electricity will ensure the closing down of all generating stations of authorised undertakers which are not selected by the Board ; the Act, however, empowers the Electricity Commissioners to order the closing down of any such station where the cost of generating at the station is greater than the cost of purchase from the Board. The Board will ultimately come under an obligation to supply authorised undertakers with the electricity they require ; but the Board may not (with certain exceptions) supply directly to consumers.

It will be seen that the Board is a body operating commercially, though not on a profit-making basis. They are thus wholly different in character from the Electricity Commissioners. The Board are themselves authorised undertakers.

A DISCUSSION took place on Mr. H. F. BIDDER'S Paper entitled

THE LAW RELATING TO THE SUPPLY OF ELECTRICITY.

Mr. E. H. LEEDER (Past-President) said he had been asked to propose the vote of thanks to Mr. Bidder for his excellent Paper on "The law relating to the supply of electricity," and it gave him very much pleasure to do so.

The various Electricity Acts had placed enormous powers in the hands of the Ministry of Transport and the Electricity Commissioners. At the same time it was generally considered beneficial especially to investors in electrical undertakings that distributing companies could obtain the powers they required either by means of Provisional Orders or by special Acts. The result often was the insertion of hidden clauses with the object of obtaining powers in excess of those contained in the existing code. For instance, in 1932 a power distributing company he knew lodged a Bill in Parliament with the alleged object of obtaining further powers to reorganise, increase, define and regulate their capital and borrowing powers, and for other purposes. Amongst others a clause entitled "Wayleaves" was inserted which, if it had not been opposed by a number of influential landowners, would have had the effect of extending Section 22 of the Electricity (Supply) Act of 1919. It seemed to him most undesirable that some individual distributing companies should be given special powers by Parliament whilst others contented themselves with Provisional Orders.

His principal object, however, in calling attention to the point was that electricity undertakings were supposed to be dissatisfied with the decision in Pitt and Others v. Ministry of Transport, and would probably attempt to make that decision inoperative by an application for additional powers.

He was also not at all satisfied with the manner in which sitting tenants were frequently induced by wayleave officers to sign agreements which were subsequently used as a lever for persuading owners to sign similar agreements without consulting their agents or solicitors.

He was also opposed to a uniform rate of payment of so much per tower or pole, irrespective of the value of the land through which the easement passed. At the same time so long as the wayleave agreement contained an express provision to the effect that the agreed periodical payments were not to be deemed to be the annual value for the purpose of assessing the compensation to which the owner might hereafter be entitled, it was not so material.

He did, however, most strongly contend that a uniform form of agreement should be generally adopted, if possible.

He knew The Chartered Surveyors' Institution, the Auctioneers' Institute and the Land Agents' Society had practically agreed a form which he had seen, but he was not prepared to subscribe to it until he was satisfied as to the legal effect of the clause relating to lateral and vertical mineral support which, while purporting not to interfere with the right of the grantor, his lessees and tenants, to work the minerals and in so doing to withdraw lateral and vertical support, was nullified by the provision under which the supplying companies were entitled to the benefit of Section 44 (2) of the Electricity Supply Act, 1926. The effect of that section made them persons having an " interest in the " land " which automatically brought into operation Section 8 of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, by which, on application to the Board of Trade, restrictions might be imposed on the working of the minerals in such a manner as to secure support for the buildings or works of the undertakers.

In almost all the wayleave agreements that his firm had entered into on behalf of owners, the supply companies had agreed to contract out of the liability sought to be placed on the owners, but he had been informed that certain firms of solicitors responsible for advising The Chartered Surveyors and other kindred Institutions were of opinion that it was illegal to do so. On the other hand other firms held the view there was nothing in the Acts to prevent the contracting out of that clause by agreement.

It was, of course, true that compensation was payable and restrictions could be imposed by the Commissioners. At the same time Sub-clause (7) of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act ran as follows:—

> " (7) In determining whether restrictions should be imposed the Commission shall have regard to the value of the buildings or works or the cost of repairing damage likely to be caused thereto by subsidence, as compared with the value of the minerals, or to the importance in the national interest of the erection or preservation of the buildings or works, as compared with the importance in the national interest of the working of the minerals."

That made it very difficult for mineral-owners and their lessees to foresee how their respective rights might be curtailed by reason of the fact that an electricity undertaking might be considered of greater national importance as compared with the working of the minerals.

From the correspondence that passed prior to an inquiry which was ordered as the result of the refusal of certain clients of his to grant a wayleave over a mineral estate of which they were the surface owners and had granted mineral and quarrying rights to a third party, it appeared that the Board themselves were in doubt whether in the case of a voluntary grant of easement it was definite the wayleave had been granted in pursuance of Section 22 of the Act of 1919. They suggested the following proviso should be added in order to make the point absolutely certain:—

> " Provided, nevertheless, that any supports for electric lines above ground erected under this agreement shall be deemed to have been erected in pursuance of powers conferred on the Board under Section 22 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, and the Board will accordingly be entitled to the benefit of Section 44 (2) of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1926."

Subsequent to the decision in the case of Pitt and Others v. The Ministry of Transport, the wayleave rent fixed by the Ministry fell due, and upon it being tendered his firm declined to accept it on the grounds that the Minister of Transport's award was ultra vires. After some correspondence the Central Electricity Board agreed to the Order being substituted by an amended agreement in the form his firm insisted upon with all electricity undertakers under which their client's interests in the minerals, and the existence of any lease or agreement relating thereto, were specifically disclosed, with the following clause relating to lateral and vertical support:—

> " Nothing in this agreement shall diminish, affect or interfere with the right of the grantor and his lessees and tenants or the owner or lessees of the mines and minerals under the said land to use the said land or to work any mines or minerals therein or thereunder in as full and ample a manner as if this agreement had not been made and in working the said mines and minerals it shall be lawful for the grantor or the owner or lessees thereof to withdraw vertical and lateral support from the works and the grantor or other the owner or lessee of the said mines and minerals shall not be liable to pay any compensation for damage that may be caused in working the said mines and minerals provided nevertheless that any supports for electric lines above ground erected under this agreement shall be deemed to have > been erected in pursuance of powers conferred on the Board under Section 22 of the Electricity (Supply) Act 1919 and the Board shall not be entitled to the benefit of Section 44 (2) of the Electricity (Supply) Act 1926."

The reason he had given the foregoing details was in order to ask the author whether an agreement entered into in that form was or was not legally binding upon the respective parties.

The subject was of considerable importance to all surveyors and land agents in mineral areas. Those members who were interested in minerals generally and in electricity wayleaves in particular would, he was satisfied, much appreciate the author's Paper, which was of very great value to the profession as a whole.

Mr. DRYLAND HASLAM (Member of Council), in seconding the vote of thanks, said the subject was complex, and the author had dealt with it fully and in a simple and clear manner. When the Paper appeared in the Transactions it would be a very valuable work of reference for all members. Our beautiful countryside was in many cases being spoilt by pylons. He himself had done his best to prevent the district north of the Thames between Reading and Pangbourne being spoilt, but he had been unsuccessful ; and he had hoped the author would have given a hint as to what was the greatest amount of compensation that could be obtained for spoiling a district. He had hoped also that the author would have had something to say about the price that an area would have to pay for the electricity when it got it. In the village which was nearest him the inhabitants had to pay at present 10*d*. a unit, which seemed very excessive.

He understood there were very many distinguished visitors present who knew much more about the subject that he did. Therefore he did not propose to say anything more except, in the name of the members, to thank Mr. Bidder most heartily for the excellent Paper he had given.

Mr. W. CRAIG HENDERSON, K.C. (Visitor), said that he would like to say one word of supplement to the Paper. Mr. Bidder had spoken of the provisions of Section 22 of the Act of 1919, under which, for the first time, power had been given to the Minister of Transport to give his consent for the placing of lines across private lands. There were really two consents wanted, because under a section of the Electric Lighting Clauses Act, 1899, Section 10 (b), it was not permissible to put any lines above ground without the consent of the Board of Trade. That was without respect to the particular route of the lines. In order to get permission one had first of all, now that the Board of Trade was replaced by the Minister, to get the Minister's consent to put lines above ground ; but if one wanted to put them across private lands, then, under the Act of 1919, an undertaker could get his consent on terms and conditions to be settled by the Minister, except the financial terms, which were settled elsewhere. Under that section it was not possible for the Minister to give his consent to the placing of lines across lands which were covered with buildings or used as a recreation ground or gardens. If he might supplement the Paper in one point he would say that in that respect the Central Electricity Board was clothed with powers which were not conferred on any other authorised undertaker, because under the Act of 1926, Section 21, the Board could obtain compulsory powers to acquire land or easements or servitudes or rights over or interests in land for any purpose connected with any of its duties, including the construction of main transmission lines.

The reason was obvious. The Board was responsible for the Grid, and the Grid was to link up generating stations all over the country. Many of the most important stations were in the centre of, or well into the area of, an urban area, and, therefore, the lines of the Board must in many cases go over land covered with buildings. Power was, therefore, given to the Board to apply to the Commissioners for a special order, clothing them with powers to erect their lines where they desired, subject to the proviso that the order was not to be made unless the Commissioners, or the Minister in confirming the order, were satisfied that the objects could not be attained without loss of efficiency or economy by the procedure under Section 19 of the 1919 Act. That meant shortly that as Section 19 of the 1919 Act had no application to lines across buildings or over gardens or recreation grounds, where it was necessary for the Board to put its lines in such places it could get, and in fact had been given, compulsory powers to take its lines there.

Perhaps he might qualify one word in Mr. Leeder's remarks. Mr. Leeder had made a reference to a Private Bill which, in dealing with wayleaves, said that the compensation was to be assessed by an engineer arbitrator instead of by the official arbitrator as was now the case. But in that Mr. Leeder was wrong. The law as it stood to-day was that, for wayleaves, compensation was assessed under Section 17 of the old Act of 1882. Another section in that same Act said that the compensation to be awarded was to be assessed by an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade—that now meant the Minister ; but by reason of the Acquisition of Lands (Assessment of Compensation) Act of 1919, where the undertaker was a public authority, then the assessment was made by the official arbitrator. That meant that in the case of claims against the Central Electricity Board compensation would have to be assessed by the official arbitrator, but in the case of the ordinary undertaker, as the promoters of that particular Bill were, the mode of assessment proposed was exactly that proposed by the general law of the country to-day.

Mr. E. W. Hudson (Solicitor to the Electricity Commissioners) (Visitor) said he felt that the time had now come to bring in not merely a Consolidation Bill but a Bill enacting new matter as well, because it seemed to him perfectly ridiculous that in these modern days, when electricity was such a powerful factor, that one should have to go back to the Act of 1882, which incorporated the provisions of the Gas Works Clauses Act of 1847, and to read for " electric line " the equivalent of gas pipe, or whatever it had been. Therefore he thought it highly desirable that a Consolidation Bill should be brought in.

Whilst he had been thinking on that subject the quatrain of Omar Khayyam had been brought forcibly before his mind:—

" Ah Love! could thou and I with Fate conspire
To grasp this sorry Scheme of Things entire,
Would not we shatter it to bits—and then
Remould it nearer to the Heart's Desire!"

The old Persian poet and philosopher had the right idea of a Consolidation Bill.

Mr. W. L. Lloyd Roberts (Solicitor to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners) (Visitor) said that the first question which a surveyor had to ask himself on receipt of a notice to place a line across his client's land was: What right or interest are the undertakers going to acquire in or over the land? and it seemed to him that a surveyor must know that before he could make his valuation. He entirely agreed with Mr. Bidder that the term " wayleave " was inappropriate and misleading, and it might be of some assistance in considering that question if he called attention to the remarks of some of the Judges on that point.

The first case was the Metropolitan Railway Company, v. Fowler, 1893, A. C., 416. That was a case where a claim was made for land tax on a tunnel under a street. The railway company said they were not liable on the ground that they had only an easement, as the words of their Act only entitled them to " appropriate and use the sub-soil and undersurface." The Judges would not accept that view. Lord Herschell stated that the railway company were the owners of an hereditament whether it was below the surface or on the surface, and that the railway company held the piece of land to the exclusion of any other person.

The same thing applied where a tower or pole was placed on the land, as the owner was deprived of the portion on which it stood and the company had the exclusive use.

The point was dealt with in another way in the case of Reilly v. Booth, 44 Ch. D., 26. Lopes, L.J., in his judgment said:—

> "The exclusive or unrestricted use of a piece of land beyond all question passes the property or ownership in that land, and there is no easement known to law which gives unrestricted use of a piece of land."

What were the words used in Section 22 of the Electricity (Supply) Act of 1919? The undertakers—

> "may place any electric line below ground across any land, and above ground across any land other than land covered by buildings or used as a garden or pleasure-ground in cases where the placing of such lines above ground is otherwise lawful, and where any line has been so placed across any land the joint electricity authority or undertakers may enter on the land for the purpose of repairing or altering the line."

In effect the word "place" had the same meaning as "appropriate and use." If one had the exclusive right to place a thing on a specific piece of land, one appropriated and used it, and that seemed to be the view of the Judges in the case of West Midlands Joint Electricity Authority v. Pitt and Others (48 T. L. R., 334). The Master of the Rolls stated:—

> "It was clear that it was not a mere wayleave or licence that was given by the Minister over the defendants' land. The powers granted had been exercised and thirty-three towers had been erected on the lands belonging to the several defendants, the total area occupied by the towers being some 10,643 square feet. As Mr. Justice Macnaghten observed, it was obvious that those towers themselves must interfere with the use of the defendants' fields. It was not the mere occupation of surface from which an interference with the defendants' property could be gauged, but the necessary use of the approaches for repairs or alterations must not be overlooked, even if the compensation was to be settled at the outset once for all."

The Master of the Rolls went on to say:—

> "It was well to remember that others besides the owner and occupier of the land on which these pylons might be ordered to be erected might be injuriously affected. A con> tiguous owner might have to give support to the land in which the pylon was erected."

Those remarks all pointed to the fact that there had been a "taking of land." If an Act of Parliament authorised the taking of land compulsorily, the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, was automatically incorporated, and compensation was payable in accordance with its provisions.

Two points were raised in the West Midlands case. The owners were entitled to compensation, (1) under Section 17 of the Electric Lighting Act of 1882, or (2) alternatively under the Lands Clauses Act of 1845. In that case the landowner could get all the compensation to which he was entitled under the first head, and as that was the stronger case, most of Counsel's arguments were directed to that point and not to the second head.

The Court found that in that particular case the owner was only entitled to claim compensation under Section 17 of the Act of 1882, and that the Lands Clauses Act did not apply.

He did not agree with the decision of the Court with regard to the Lands Clauses Act, as he thought if it had been fully argued the Court would have found the other way. He could not go into the legal reasons for his opinion, but he mentioned it so that if any of those present who might have a claim which could not be fully compensated under Section 17 of the Act of 1882 could obtain legal advice as to whether the claim could not be made under the Lands Clauses Act of 1845.

In connection with those last remarks he would like to quote from the judgment of Mr. Justice Astbury in the case of Welldon v. The Butterley Company, Limited (1920), 1 Ch., 153. Mr. Justice Astbury said:—

> "Before I pass from this case I would refer to the words of Lord Halsbury in Quinn v. Leathem, which not for the first time I have found it advantageous to bear in mind. He says: 'There are two observations of a general character which I wish to make, and one is to repeat what I have very often said before, that every judgment must be read as applicable to the particular facts proved, or assume to be proved, since the generality of the expressions which may be found there are not intended to be expositions of the whole law, but governed and qualified by the particular facts of the case in which such expressions are to be found. The other is that a case is only an authority for what it actually decides. I entirely deny that it can be quoted for a proposition that may seem to follow logically from it.'"

There was another point to which he would like to call attention, and that was the form of consent given by the Minister of Transport and the effect of it on the amount of compensation to be paid.

He assumed the Minister had the right to give the undertakers, say, a term of twenty years. If he did, on what basis was the claim for compensation to be made, for example, in the case of building land ripe for development? His (Mr. Roberts') view was that the owner could claim full compensation as if the taking were for all time.

He did not think that the Minister had the power which he claimed for reserving to himself the right to review the consent which he had given, as he was functus officio after he had once given his consent. There was no Act, so far as he (Mr. Roberts) knew, that gave power for undertakers to take compulsorily a man's property for a short term of years, and it was obvious that Parliament never intended to give compulsory powers to any undertakers to do this, as it would be most unfair to the landowner. The Electric Lighting Acts were in the nature of private Acts, and they were always strictly construed against the undertakers, and as there was no specific provision in those Acts authorising the taking of land for a term of years, he thought the power which the Minister reserved to himself in the consent was ultra vires.

If Mr. Hudson was contemplating new legislation, he would strongly suggest that he should put in a clause to the effect that any arbitrator should be a surveyor and not an engineer, and that it should be compulsory on every electrical undertaker to appoint a surveyor as a wayleave officer. He had never yet heard of a surveyor acting as a wayleave officer for electrical undertakers. It would be very helpful from the landowner's point of view if he could discuss the question of compensation with a surveyor appointed on behalf of the electrical undertaker, and he was sure there would then be no difficulty in settling compensation.

Mr. A. N. Rye (Visitor) said he desired those present to look at the matter for one moment from a different angle. Most of their clients wanted electricity, and there were a number of companies who wanted to supply it. The judgment in the Pitt case had put much difficulty in the way of the electricity supplier. With Grid lines carrying large quantities of power, the probable compensation was not likely to be a high ratio of the power which was being handled. The position was different in the case of the rural area, and it made it extremely difficult for the electricity supplier to make his plans without knowing what the compensation would be. In practice he had found it necessary to make a rule in country areas that unless those things could be adjusted before the line was put up the line would not be put up at all. So it might be that a community, whom the company would have been quite glad to supply with electricity, did not get the supply.

He put that side of the question because he wanted to appeal to the various parties to get together and see if they could not settle those things so that a supply in those country areas might be given on terms which were possible to both parties. One speaker had mentioned that he had had to pay a price of 10*d*. It would be interesting to calculate how much of that was compensation.

He did not suggest that The Chartered Surveyors' Institution should go out of their way to assist a company. He did not suggest that the company should escape the liabilities which it ought reasonably to bear, but if those liabilities resulted in a community being deprived of a service which they wanted, the ultimate result might not be what the landowner or his advisers wished. He was speaking as one who would like to see people have a supply of electricity if it could be possibly given to them economically. But electricity supply was a very "thin" proposition in many country areas.

Mr. Hudson had made the suggestion that when there was a Consolidation Act new matter should be introduced. Amongst that new matter there was one thing which closely affected the companies, and that was compulsory purchase. It also affected everyone. Both from the point of view of the community and the company some practical arrangement really ought to be made with regard to the matter. Many years ago a tenure of forty-two years had been granted to companies. Many of those tenures were coming to an end. There were quite a number of areas throughout the country where surveyors' clients desired a supply of electricity. Such an area to-day might contain a few houses only, but it might be capable of considerable development over the next 10 or 15 years. If, however, the company had only the certainty of five years' tenure, it was almost hopeless for them to take a long view and to lay down a proper scheme for that area; the result would be piecemeal development, waste of capital, and higher charges than would otherwise be necessary.

Mr. O. A. SHERRARD (Visitor) remarked that it might be as well for surveyors to know what they would have to do if they were employed as wayleave officers. They would have to get the consent of the local authority, of the county council, of the Electricity Commissioners, of the Minister of Transport, of the owner, of the tenant, and then they would have to satisfy the Air Ministry that they were doing no harm. They would also have to satisfy the Board of Ancient Monuments and societies such as the C.P.R.E., and so on, that they were doing no harm. When that had been done the surveyor would have got one wayleave out of the 200 or 300 which he had to start upon. By the time those consents had been obtained, those concerned in getting them did know something of what the land was like over which they were going to cross. The Central Electricity Board wanted to pay a fair compensation. The trouble was to find out what the compensation ought to be.

It was really a difficult proposition. The Board had done the best they could by discussing the matter with a large number of societies with a view to getting some reasonable basis for wayleaves across rural areas, and he was glad to say that they had succeeded in reaching an agreement, which, as had been pointed out, was not binding in law but which he found was pretty well binding in practice both on the owners and on the Board. At all events both sides seemed to get on very well with it. But that applied only to rural areas or to rural land, and not to land which was supposed to be building land.

When he came to building land he was really in a very great difficulty, for the reason that he found that owners took a wholly different view, if they had built on the land, from the view they took if they were merely proposing to build on it. Those who did build on it apparently sold their houses without the least difficulty, but if they did not build on it then they got frightened and wanted very large sums of money. How was he to reconcile those two points of view? Apparently if the owners took their courage in their hands all was well, but if they were failing in their courage it seemed that he had to pay for their lack of courage.

If surveyors could help the Board in the difficulty he would be very grateful to them, because the Board did want to pay a fair amount, but they certainly did not want to pay more than a fair amount. That was the basis on which they stood.

Mr. A. M. SILLAR (Visitor) said he spoke as a consulting engineer who had been connected with the electricity-supply industry since its earliest days. He had started work in an electricity undertaking in 1882, and had known of the Act of that time and what it laid down. Unlike many people he (Mr. Sillar) thought that the Act of 1882 was the best possible thing that could have happened.

The companies had then been formed not for electric lighting but in order to get money out of the public. Those companies were grievously disappointed when Joseph Chamberlain by the 1882 Act, limiting the tenure to a number of years, dried up the sources of finance. That number of years originally had been 21 but was lengthened in 1888 to 42. The promoters in 1882 had been apparently satisfied with the 21 years. In fact, he thought they would have been satisfied with even a shorter period, as what they really were looking to was subscriptions from the public.

Mr. Craig Henderson had said there had been no motors at that time. Practically there had not been. The company with which he himself had then been connected had purchased the patent of a motor for £3,000. It was a 1 horse-power motor and had a spindle about half an inch in diameter, and he could stop it when running at full speed by pinching it with his fingers. From that it could be imagined that the time had not then been ripe to give people concessions in perpetuity to supply electricity. One speaker had said that he would like to see concessions in perpetuity again given to the companies, but from his own personal experience he should be very sorry indeed to see that come about. If the old companies had been given concessions in perpetuity he did not know what the state of the industry would be to-day.

Mr. K. E. B. Glenny (Chartered Surveyor), referring to the importance of sub-stations in the transmission system, said that the only compulsory powers which the companies had of acquiring land for sub-stations was derived from Section 1 of the Public Works Facilities Act of 1930, a somewhat nebulous section which, however, up to the present had been very useful to the companies. He would suggest to Mr. Hudson that if he were in fact contemplating further legislation the question of sub-stations should be dealt with in it. One found various difficulties in connection with sub-stations, mostly with regard to planning restrictions. Some authorities thought that if one was putting up a small sub-station one was proposing to erect a power-station. Owners thought the same with regard to restrictions, and building lines also were a source of trouble. It was always difficult to find a suitable site for a sub-station, even though it were a site of only 12 feet × 13 feet. The only occasion really when things were easy was when a new estate was being developed. In that case one could go to the owner before he started development and say to him "If you want electricity "on this estate you must provide some site upon which we can "put our sub-station"; but failing that, it did take in many cases months in order to find a suitable site.

Surveyors were concerned mainly with three points—wayleaves, surface damage, and sub-stations. Much of the trouble with wayleaves over agricultural land could have been avoided if surveyors had been appointed as wayleave officers. The trouble had arisen because the persons originally employed were not agriculturally minded. The farmer was quite ready to welcome them provided they would look at the matter from his point of view, but few wayleave officers had had any knowledge of agriculture. Small points, he had noticed, caused a deal of difficulty, such as gates left open, leaving about short lengths of wire where stock was running, breaking through hedges and failure to repair, entry on land just prior to harvest, trampling down market-garden crops of a particular value, and injudicious and indiscriminate timber lopping. Had such small points as those been observed at the outset three or four years ago the course of the undertakers would have been very much easier. His experience was that that state of affairs had lately been much remedied, possibly because to-day the undertakers had a far better understanding of the farmers' difficulties.

Unfortunately the attitude of three or four years ago had had a double result. Firstly, it had been reflected in the surface-damage claim of the particular farmer affected, because many justifiable items of claim had been put in which in the undertakers' eyes could not be understood. Secondly, the farmer was alienated when he in his turn had been asked to grant a wayleave.

As regards wayleaves over potential factory land, many of the big power-stations to-day were situated in riverside sites, and most of the wayleave lines went out over what was to the undertakers virtually marsh land—grazing-land. They frequently quite forgot that most of that land was potential factory land. Their lines went out at all angles over the same field, and there might be trouble both to the landowners and to the supply undertakers in the future in that regard. A line running over a potential building estate was comparatively innocuous, but the size of a factory site made it almost impossible to divert a line satisfactorily when the factory come to be put up. Therefore those concerned would be faced, some time or other, with the alternatives of buying the site, acquiring a compulsory wayleave, with the consequent heavy compensation, or of acquiring an alternative wayleave, which might be expensive to both parties. He questioned whether that aspect of supply had been fully taken into account. In his view the question would surely arise in an acute form in the next few years.

Mr. C. HERBERT BEDELLS said the last speaker had referred to some sections of the subject which were interesting to surveyors, but he had omitted one ; he had not referred to the interests of surveyors concerned with buildings. Mr. Bidder in his Paper had dealt with the change of supply from direct to alternating current.

He (Mr. Bedells) did not know how many present had had difficulties in regard to that question. Undertakers were not allowed thus to transfer their system except with the consent of the authority, usually, he thought, the Electricity Board; but in London the London County Council had been exercising that function. Mr. Bidder had pointed out that when giving their approval it was the practice of the Commissioners to impose conditions as to replacement of consumers' apparatus of a character only suitable for one type of current by apparatus suitable for the other. He had a case at present where the electricity supply company (who were in the ordinary cases so responsible) claimed not to be responsible in his case on the ground that his client, a freeholder, having received his property vacant on the termination of a lease, became, they contended, a new consumer, and responsible therefore to make his machinery comply with their altered requirements at his own expense. That was a state of things which had never been intended and it seemed quite inequitable. If a supply company for their own purpose changed the owners' supply, and the machinery was in itself in good repair and condition, then the company should bear the expense of making the transfer. The London County Council, in this particular instance, had put the supply company under a clause which appeared, on hasty perusal, adequate to carry that obligation, but in the companies' contention it did not; and he thought The Institution ought to make representations to the Board asking them to see that in any future consents given to a change of system it was made clear that all equitable claims thus arising should be met by the supply company.

Mr. R. W. TRUMPER (Professional Associate) said that the Paper was an extremely useful one to surveyors. But he thought that Mr. Rye's remark, that while compensation was fair, a flat rate only would be paid because that was all the companies could afford, deserved a rejoinder. If those for whom Mr. Rye spoke had appointed a surveyor of their own, that surveyor could have told them "You can get through in a certain position quite easily, "but if you must go through another position you will have to "pay heavy compensation," and he could have given just as good an estimate of the cost as an electrical engineer. Also if they had had a surveyor to advise them when it was tactful to knock out three parts of a hedge, or to cut down trees which they had originally said they were not going to cut down, then the electricity companies would have got along a good deal better, and they would find that electricity could be supplied very much cheaper than it would be supplied if they went on at their present rate. They would declare, for example, that they were going definitely through a certain part of an estate ; that they might consider objections, but did not want to because it would cost so much to alter the line ; that they must start at once, and did not want to pay anything. Then there was the representative presumably of the electric companies who said " It may be " fairer in a certain case to pay more compensation than in " other cases, but I cannot afford to do it because it upsets my " estimates." It was time that public authorities sought proper advice. If the companies had taken proper advice in the early stages, then he thought they would have been able to get their wayleaves across agricultural land (and he was only speaking of agricultural land) much more cheaply than they actually had.

If one failed to agree with the representatives of the company, there was then an inquiry before the Minister. If the landowner refused to consent to lines across his property, the Minister might give his consent. But who was the Minister? It was not the Minister of Transport himself. It was some official tucked away in the back end of his office. One did not know in the least whom he consulted, what procedure he adopted, to what evidence he listened, or anything about it. He came down to hold an inquiry. Sometimes he was assisted on the bench by a representative of the Electricity Commission. He gave an award which he reserved the right to vary at any time. It was " The new despotism " over again. If the executive continued to treat large landowners as they had been doing, and to pull down and rebuild the present structure of the Electric Lighting Acts, their operations would have to be very carefully watched by The Institution and the landed interests. The landed interests wanted electricity, and they were prepared to pay a reasonable price for it, provided that the electrical companies would deal fairly with them ; but when the electrical companies sent down somebody to deal with the matter who did not understand agriculture or landed interests in the slightest degree, and who, if no agreement could be reached, sent down an electrical engineer from London to settle the point, it was going much too far.

A vote of thanks was put to the meeting and carried with acclamation.

PLANNING IN RELATION TO FUTURE POPULATION.

By Professor A. M. Carr-Saunders
(Professor of Social Science, Liverpool University).

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Chartered Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 8th January, 1934.

It is not possible to say with certainty what the popula- of this or of any other country will be at any given future date. The size of the population is the result of the interaction of certain forces, and we do not know what the strength of those forces will be in the future. We do know, however, much about their operation during the last hundred years or so; we can observe changes in their magnitude, and, moreover, we know something about the causes of these changes. There are thus substantial grounds for making forecasts about the strength of these factors at least in the immediate future; and, given assumptions about their future magnitude, it is an easy task to estimate the future population. The first task is therefore to ascertain what factors there are about which assumptions are required upon which to found any estimate of future population.

Population increases by birth and immigration; it decreases by death and emigration. Let us consider migration movements first. With very few exceptions, of which 1932 was an example, annual emigration has exceeded annual immigration for more than a century, and there has been a net loss of people from this country by migration movements. From 1872 to 1881 the average annual loss was 154,677. From 1902 to 1911 it was 167,093. In 1932 there was an inward balance, and the figures for 1933 may show the same exceptional phenomenon which is obviously due to the economic depression. But the present years are, we must hope, abnormal years; and in view of the post-war system of restrictions upon immigration, and of the post-war system of subsidised emigration, which are likely to be continued to be supported by all political parties, we must forecast in normal years some annual loss by excess of emigration over immigration. It is not necessary to name any figure because we are only dealing with general tendencies. It is necessary merely to remember that the results, at which we shall arrive after making assumptions about future births and deaths, will require correction for loss through migration movements. In other words, the population of the future will almost certainly be less than that which we are led to anticipate by attending only to the influence of births and deaths.

Let us now consider births and deaths. Death, like emigration, removes members of the populations belonging to every age group. Birth, on the other hand, unlike immigration, only adds at the bottom. There is this further difference between birth and death. It is easier to make assumptions about the latter than about the former. We may be certain that men will continue to strive to avoid death, whereas we cannot be certain that they will continue to take steps to keep the size of the family as small as at present. Turning our attention now to chances of death in the future, new and uncontrollable diseases may of course appear, or civilisation may break down, in which case deaths from existing causes would increase with the decay of medical and sanitary services. But I propose to assume that no catastrophes will occur, and that our present health services will not merely be maintained but will be strengthened. Under these assumptions what importance should we attribute to the impact of death upon the population of the future?

The impact of death is measured by mortality rates, that is by calculating the number per 1,000 of persons of each age who die in a year. The rates are highest for the youngest and the oldest, and least for those in the intervening years. For a long time improvement in the rates has been steady, and, on the assumptions mentioned above, we may anticipate that it will continue. But it is most necessary to realise the limits which are set to our expectations. In the first place what alone can be accomplished is to bring everyone who is born through to the time when the body wears out. It is not possible at present to prolong the natural term of life, nor is it likely to become possible in the near future. Already so much has been done that the expectation of life at birth in this country is nearly 60 years. This is well known; what is not so well appreciated is the second point that where most progress remains to be made is in the older age groups, and that such progress will be of very limited effect upon the future course of population. Improvement of mortality rates for the older age groups will not be without effect; but the effect will merely be that at any given date the population will be somewhat greater. There will be no effect upon trend because the lives saved will be those of persons incapable of reproduction. The limiting factor in the trend of population is represented by the women of child-bearing age. So far as the trend of population is concerned, all that improvement in mortality rates can do is to bring every girl born through to the end of the child-bearing period. Supposing the child-bearing period to extend over the 35 years from 15 to 50, then the ideal would be that every girl born would live through 35 years in the child-bearing age. Already, in 1927, the expectation was that every girl born would live through 28 child-bearing years. Little more therefore remains to be done, and progress can only be slow in so far as improvement in health conditions will affect trend of population.

So far I have deliberately avoided the use of the term "death-rate." The death-rate is compounded of two elements —the mortality rates and the age groupings. It can easily be seen that of two populations of the same size and experiencing the same mortality rates, one of which has more persons per 1,000 than the other in the older age groups which experience a high mortality, the former will show a higher death-rate than the latter though health conditions (which are measured by mortality rates) are the same for both. In this country the proportion of persons in the higher age groups increases every year because, owing to the reduced birth-rate, the proportion of persons in the younger age groups declines. Therefore of the two factors which enter into the death-rate, one—the mortality rate—is moving in a fashion tending to reduce the death-rate, whereas the other—the age grouping—is moving in a contrary direction. Any assumptions which are at all reasonable about future mortality rates and future age groupings lead us to forecast an increase in the death-rate because the effect of the relative increase of persons in the older age groups will overshadow such diminution of mortality rates as we can expect.

Since we are dealing only with general trends it is not necessary to be more precise. An apology may seem demanded for entering into these matters at all. They are fairly familiar. But they are not so widely understood as is desirable. In illustration of this it is only necessary to look at the report of the debate which took place in the House of Commons on July 7th of last year when the vote for the Ministry of Health was under consideration. The curious reader will there find the most extraordinary series of mis-statements and misunderstandings on this subject; it is evident enough that our legislators are not included among that section of the public to which all these things are clear.

It remains to consider the recruitment of the population by birth. As in the case of the death-rate, the birth-rate is compounded of two elements—the fertility of women of child-bearing age and the proportion of women of that age per 1,000 in the population. Just as the death-rate will rise if the proportion of those in the older age groups increases—health conditions remaining the same—so the birth-rate will fall if the proportion of women of child bearing age decreases—the fertility of women remaining the same. We must anticipate a decrease in the proportion of women of child-bearing age in the future, especially in the earlier years of the child-bearing period when fertility is at its maximum, and therefore we have here a movement making for a decline in the birth-rate.

In regard to the birth-rate of the future, however, this factor is not of the same importance as fertility. By fertility is meant the chance that a women of given age, say 25, will reproduce within a year. Fertility, so understood, has been declining in this country for more than half a century, and the reasons for the decline have been much debated. There is no-one, whose opinion in relation to this problem deserves attention, who does not attribute very considerable importance to deliberate family limitation. There are some authorities who believe that deliberate family limitation is so much more important than any other factor that it alone deserves attention. Other authorities are inclined to suspect that subsidiary factors tending to decrease the fertility of married women are at work, though, so far as I know, no conclusive proof has been given of their operation. In any case deliberate family limitation plays so large and important a part in keeping fertility low that we may leave the possible existence of other factors out of account.

It follows that attempts to forecast the birth-rate must be open to a far larger measure of doubt than attempts to forecast the death-rate. We do not know what view men will hold in the future about the desirable size of the family. All we can do is to note how men have been behaving in the immediate past, to examine the reasons for their conduct, and to ask whether the same motives are likely to influence them in the future. We find that fertility has been steadily declining for over half a century and that it continues to decline to this day. There is no reason whatever to connect this decline with special economic conditions. It has been as well marked in young, sparsely populated, agricultural countries overseas as in the old, densely populated, unbanised countries of Western Europe. It is sometimes said that, if and when prosperity returns, fertility will rise. For this view there is no support whatever; we have only to remember that fertility was declining heavily in the United States in the golden days before 1929 to realise its falsity. The evidence goes to show that the decline is a social phenomenon; it has spread over just that group of countries which show the same social habits whatever their economic conditions may be. The reasons for adopting the small family habit are many. We shall perhaps not be far wrong if we select as of particular importance the age-long desire of women to be freed from a life of child-bearing, the popularisation of means to fulfil this desire, the breakdown of religious restraints upon the use of such means, and the growth of opportunities for the employment of time not given up to child rearing. It is extremely unlikely that any of these reasons will become less cogent in the near future. Therefore we have no grounds for expecting an increase in the size of the family in the near future. On the contrary, it does not seem that fertility has yet reached its lowest point.

Let us suppose, however, that fertility declines no further and stabilises at its present strength, then it is easy to show that in a few years the death-rate, on the assumptions made above, will rise, and will first equal and then exceed the birth-rate, even if the average size of the family declines no further. The population, in other words, will cease to increase and will begin to decline within ten years from now, and the decline may be as much as two millions soon after the turn of the century. It is necessary to remember that this forecast is made on assumptions which are favourable to population. It is more likely that fertility will continue to decline than to stabilise at its present level, and it is probable that there will again be some loss by emigration in the future as in the past. That is to say, this forecast, if it proves to err, will almost certainly be found to be erroneous in putting the date of the beginning of the decline too late and the rate of the decline too low.

It may be illuminating to look at the situation in another manner. When we know the age distribution of a population, that is to say, when we know how many are between the ages of 0 and 5, how many between 5 and 10, and so on, we can construct a graph so as to represent the population in the form of a pyramid. The pyramid is built up of rectangular blocks proportional in size to the age group which they represent. If another graph is made to represent the population five years later, the former age group 0-5 will now be the group 5-10; and since some will have died in the meantime, the block representing this group will be smaller than it was five years before. If we construct such a pyramid of a population, it is obvious that, if the lowest blocks are not larger than the higher blocks, the trend of population is set towards the decline. This is so, because, as we saw, each block loses by the attrition of death as the years pass, and if the lowest block is not larger than that immediately above it, it will not be as large as that block when in the course of years it takes its place. If such a graph is made of the population of this country at the present time, we find that the lowest age groups do not equal in number the immediately higher age groups. It follows that the trend is towards decline.

On the subject of forecasting the future population of this country no more need be said, and we can now turn to a consideration of planning in the light of these forecasts. There are three directions in which it is possible to attempt to control population. The aim may be to reduce, increase or maintain the existing population; it may be to re-distribute the population geographically; lastly, it may be to change the quality of the population. The first two aims have this in common—that they take no account of inborn differences between members of the population. But there are inborn differences and they are important; and it is not merely a possible but also a proper objective of any community to attempt to improve its racial qualities—at least so far as the elimination of inherited unfitness is concerned. This problem, however, is surrounded with difficulties, and it is not possible to consider it here. One remark may, nevertheless, be made.

Any effort to achieve any one of these three aims will have some effect in the other two spheres. Any attempt to control quantity or geographical distribution, for instance, will not be without its bearings upon quality. Therefore in the last resort a population policy must be a co-ordinated programme. But in what follows we may consider the two quantitative aspects separately, though it must be borne in mind that any conclusions reached may require revision when their bearing upon other aspects of the matter is taken into account.

At this point objection may be raised to the whole conception of planning. Have not things, it may be said, worked out fairly well in the past? Has not the density of population about kept pace with needs? Had we better not leave fairly well alone? The first point to be made in reply is that things have often not worked out well; the present distribution of the population in this country is a case in point, as will be shown later. The need for planning, however, rests on far stronger grounds than this. It must be realised that the whole situation has been transformed within the last few decades. Formerly we knew little about the aims which it was desirable to pursue, and we were not armed with the means of attaining them. We now possess those means. We do much to control the death-rate, we choose the size of our families, we can redistribute population, directly by the building of new towns such as Letchworth and Welwyn, and indirectly by changes in rating and taxation. The question before us is not whether or not to act since we act effectively already; the question is whether to continue to act without clear aim as now, or whether to select our aim after careful discussion and to take steps to reach it—that is to say, to plan.

When therefore we approach the first problem, that of planning for a desirable density of population in this country, we must remember that we are already taking deliberate action which is in course of bringing about a certain state of things—namely, the cessation of increase and the beginning of decrease. While we have been acting with full consciousness of the result so far as size of family is concerned, we have been quite oblivious of the effect of our actions upon the population as a whole. But the density of population is of profound importance to all of us, and we must enquire what density of population is desirable.

In recent years there has been much discussion centering round the phrase "optimum population." The term was first employed by economists. For them it has a precise meaning and indicates that density of population which for a given area under given conditions yields the highest average real income per head. But it does not follow that, when an economist is asked whether the population of a country is at the optimum, he can return a definite answer. There are indeed situations, such as that in Ireland before the famine, when the lack of adjustment is patent to all. When it is a question of the possibility of maladjustment in lesser degree, an economist may be able to form an opinion about the position if he has before him certain figures extending over a period of years. But, even if these figures are available, they may not lead to any definite conclusion, and as a matter of fact, they are available for very few countries in the form desired. So far as this country is concerned, economists are not prepared to say whether it is over-populated or not.

The economist, therefore, can give no guidance in this matter of the density of population which is desirable in this country. But there is also the sociologist. To him optimum population has no precise quantitative meaning. Nevertheless, it is a very real thing to be evaluated by judgment though not by mathematics. The sociologist means by "optimum population" that number which is best for healthy social life. He sees virtues in towns, but he believes that, when towns grow beyond a certain size, inevitable evils arise and overbear the virtues of aggregation. There must thus be an optimum size of town from the sociological point of view. He also sees virtue in rural life, but this disappears as the countryside undergoes suburbanisation. The ill results that are apprehended as the consequence of a too great density of population are somewhat intangible but no less real. What is feared is loss of energy and initiative, the replacement of them by a certain tameness, of the rule of mob emotions and mob standards. But it is something which may affect the whole future of a people. When the sociologist looks at the position of the country he finds that a quarter of the population lives in towns with a quarter of a million or more inhabitants each, and that much of the so-called rural area is already suburbanised. He is inclined to hold that a large fraction of the population is living in towns that are too large for healthy social life, and that, if decentralisation took place, the suburbanisation of the countryside would develop to a point where there would be too little country left.

Since guidance as to the density of population that is desirable is not to be had from economists, we must turn to sociologists who are equally entitled to be heard. Their opinion would seem, at first sight, to be that the present trend of things is not out of accord with what is desirable. Cessation of increase is required and some decrease of population is perhaps not undesirable. But the trend of things is set somewhat sharply towards decrease; the population is failing to replace itself by a considerable margin. There are probably not many sociologists who would hold that so large and sudden a decline is demanded by the circumstances.

This, however, is neither the only ground nor the chief ground for somewhat serious apprehensions about the present trend of population. Such correspondence as there is between the actions of men and the needs of the situation is fortuitous. In deciding the size of their families, men are guided by personal considerations, and not by the needs of the community. These personal considerations are not all selfish; parents may and do decide to limit their families because they know that they can do more for their children if they are few in number. But there can be no doubt that selfish motives predominate, and that children are very often not wanted because they consume time and money which married couples prefer to spend on themselves whether in the pursuit of mere enjoyment or of personal ambition. At the moment this form of selfishness is not out of harmony with communal needs. But it may soon become so. Then it may prove hard to eradicate a habit which has become deep set, because, while it panders to selfishness, it did not appear to be anti-social when in the formative stage.

If we desire cessation of increase and thereafter, perhaps following upon a certain decrease, stabilisation of numbers, how are we to attain it? In this matter direct methods are not open to us. We can plan directly in the matter of geographical distribution of population and of racial constitution. We can, for instance, in the latter sphere prohibit the marriage of defectives. But in the field of density of population indirect methods alone are available. We can try to persuade people to do as we wish; we can offer them inducements. In this country no efforts have yet been made along these lines. The people of this country do not know that, if they continue indefinitely to act as at present, the population must inevitably die out. They should know this; they should know also what the average size of the family must be if the present generation is to be replaced. An appeal could be made to people to play their part in the essential task of maintaining the community.

One need not be a cynic to doubt whether such an appeal would have any but a very small effect. In certain foreign countries, in recent years, propaganda in favour of maintaining or increasing the population on crude nationalistic grounds has been vigorously conducted. Apparently it has had little or no effect. Everyone is willing to applaud the father of the numerous family but he prefers to remain less encumbered himself. If nationalistic propaganda, which can work such wonders to-day, fails in this sphere, what hope is there for persuasion on rational grounds? Our expectations must be modest; but that should not prevent us from putting the facts widely and continuously before the public.

In addition to persuasion there are certain other methods of which we may avail ourselves. It is possible to attempt to redress the balance which, because salaries and wages have no relation to the size of family, falls so heavily against those who undertake family responsibilities. There are two main ways of doing this. Cash allowances can be paid to those with dependent children in proportion to their number. To this system there are, in my opinion, very grave objections. It is also possible to provide services in kind to families with children, and to grant them rent and income tax rebates. To some extent we do this already; there is, in fact, a scheme of services which if expanded would do much to equalise the position as between those who are and those who are not playing their part in raising the next generation. The expansion of these services with a careful eye upon our goal is the policy which most commends itself to me. But it is not rash to prophesy that the raising of the birth-rate to a replacement level will be an arduous task.

This aspect of the quantity problem has been emphasised here because it is very generally neglected. There is another aspect of the same problem to which attention is beginning to be paid, and on that account demands only a few words. As the birth-rate diminishes, the age constitution of the population changes. There are relatively fewer children, relatively more old people and relatively more families. The importance of these changes, when educational services, housing and social services are being planned, needs no further emphasis. The Board of Education has been prominent in bringing these coming changes to the notice of local authorities, and educational plans are being laid with estimates of the probable future school population in view. But the same cannot be said of the Ministry of Health. Sir Ernest Simon has recently pointed out that the Ministry of Health has never done anything for the guidance of housing authorities comparable with that done by the Board for education authorities. Sir Ernest Simon has earned our gratitude for doing what the Ministry should have done long ago. And he is not alone in thinking that the Ministry is painfully unequal to its task.

From the problem of the density of population that is desirable in this country, we pass to a consideration of the problem of the distribution of the population. When we come to look into the matter, we shall find that we are already taking various measures which affect the distribution of the population; it is therefore not a matter of deciding whether we ought to attempt to regulate distribution, but a matter of finding the right aim to pursue and the best methods of reaching it. As a first step it is illuminating to recall the manner in which the existing distribution of population has come about.

When in an early stage of economic development the arts of agriculture improved to the point where some men could free themselves from the work of the fields, those men congregated in centres. These centres, or towns, were situated at nodal points which were largely determined by geographical configuration. The inhabitants of these centres were occupied with the marketing and transit of surplus agricultural products, with primitive industry, the yield of which was exchanged for the agricultural products and with various commercial functions. Governmental functions were also performed at these centres and helped to swell numbers. In general it is probable that, under the play of the then prevailing forces, population was not badly distributed in view of the needs of the time. At a much later stage mechanical power, derived from water or coal, was taken into use, and population was drawn to the new centres which grew up round the sources of power. To these centres came industry, and thus there was a phase when the new centres, which were purely industrial, looked as though they would surpass the older centres which were primarily commercial. But this did not occur. For it was presently found that it was more profitable to carry on most industrial processes in or near the old centres. Thus we have the vast aggregations of London, Liverpool and Glasgow, which were in origin ports and places of commerce rather than of industry.

It has already been pointed out that in the view of most sociologists these great towns have grown to a size which is beyond the optimum for healthy social life. This needs no further emphasis. But this is not the only charge against them. The sociological indictment is not capable of precise mathematical formulation. The indictment on the score of health can be stated precisely. The evidence of vital statistics is to the effect that, after a certain size has been reached, the larger the town the worse the health. The connection between increase in size and deteriorating health conditions is not rigid, but the correspondence is close. And this is so in spite of the far greater expenditure per head in towns than in the country upon health services. If we turn from health to economics we find that the town dweller has to pay more for house accommodation, and, generally speaking, the larger the town the higher the rent; in London rents are notoriously high. He has also often to spend relatively large sums on transport to and from work—to say nothing of the loss of time and energy incurred in travelling. In the sphere of government, expenses rise with the increase in size of the town. An attempt has been made to discover the optimum size of town from the point of view of the cost of government; though the situation is too complex to allow a satisfactory conclusion to be reached, there is some indication that costs begin to rise unduly when the population of a town exceeds 200,000 or a quarter of a million. The industrialist suffers from high rent and high rates and from congestion and in many other ways.

If this is so, will not, it may be urged, a tendency towards decentralisation begin to show itself without any outside intervention? Will not industrialists begin to leave, or at least cease to settle, in these uneconomic centres? To understand why the tendency towards decentralisation is so long delayed, it is necessary to remember the reasons which attract industries to existing centres. The industrialist goes there because he finds a labour supply, because he has a market at his doors, because of existing transit and commercial facilities and for similar reasons. These attractions are lacking elsewhere, and unless he is in a very big way of business he cannot call them into being. Therefore the disadvantages of large centres have to be overwhelming before they outweigh the lack of facilities elsewhere. In this manner towns grow far beyond the size which is best for industry unless some outside intervention creates new centres to which industry can go.

This approach to the problem of the distribution of the population leads to the conclusion that the first aim of any planning is to put an end to the growth of congestion. This implies action directed to attracting population to new centres. What action is in fact being taken to-day?

It may first be observed that the effect of de-rating is to remove an incentive towards decentralisation. In so far as de-rating means that the high rates, typical of large centres of population, no longer count in the calculations of industrialists, who are deciding whether to move their works or not, it means that migration to new centres is discouraged. It is, in fact, said that the tendency towards movement has become distinctly less since de-rating came into operation.

We may next take note of town-planning. It is unnecessary to examine the provisions of the various Acts or of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932. They are well known. But it is desirable to emphasise certain aspects of this official scheme of planning. The area planned in any one scheme is that of a local authority or of a group of local authorities. The areas are administrative and not industrial. Secondly, it is planning only in a very restricted sense. There is no attempt to guide the future distribution of population except in so far as it lays down that, if population covers a certain area, then zoning regulations must be observed. Thirdly, it is not national in the sense that the horizon of those making the plan is very limited, and that there is no central co-ordinating authority whose horizon is that of the whole country. It is possible that the recent decision of the Minister of Health to establish an advisory committee to assist in the working of the Town and Country Planning Act may do something to remedy this last defect; but, at the best, such an advisory body cannot be expected to bring about that degree of co-ordination which we shall presently find to be necessary.

That there is something fundamentally defective in this existing scheme of planning, can be seen if we observe the fantastic results to which it has led. The planner often makes forecasts of the future population of his area. His usual procedure is to project into the future the rate of growth of the past few decades; he thus reaches totals for a few decades ahead which are double or treble those of the existing population. It is probably no exaggeration to say, that these plans in the aggregate are assuming that the population of the country will double or treble in a period during which, in fact, it is almost certainly going to decrease to some considerable extent. Again, the planner is encouraged to set aside districts for industrial development, and he does so in generous measure. No one can say what the size of the population would be that could be served if all these areas were, in fact, devoted to industry.

But it is likely that it would greatly exceed the figure mentioned above.

Other results follow. In the absence of planning, local authorities would, no doubt, attempt to induce industrialists to settle in these areas with the laudable intention of trying to do something for their unemployed. As a result of this system of planning, local authorities are encouraged to magnify their activities. The existence of empty spaces reserved for industry, leads to the conviction that it a duty to fill them. In consequence, we have the extraordinary spectacle of local authorities trying to attract industrialists in competition one with another, and offering such financial and other baits as they can—a condition of things which is the very negation of any kind of planning.

The question why these unfortunate results should follow from the present scheme of town and country planning may be deferred until some reference has been made to planning by non-Governmental agencies. Let us first note the remarkable experiment at Letchworth and Welwyn. These experiments have shown that new centres of population and industry can be created with the utmost benefits to all concerned. But private effort can only point the way; Government action must follow if this movement is to continue. It is true that Clause 35 of the Town and Country Planning Act facilitates the foundation of further new centres, but there does not seem to be the least likelihood that anything will be done under the clause in the near future.

Finally, note should be taken of a recent and most important development. Of late years certain bodies have been formed, varying greatly in origin, in constitution and in powers, all of which, however, share in common one important characteristic. They are considering the future of an industry from the national point of view, and are planning its future location; and since the distribution of population is determined by the location of industry, they are, in fact, planning the future distribution of the population of this country The National Shipbuilders' Security, Ltd., was set up by the shipbuilders in 1930 to buy up and close down redundant shipyards; up to date some twenty shipyards have been bought up and dismantled. A somewhat similar scheme is being operated in the woolcombing industry under the title of "Woolcombers' Mutual Association, Ltd." The iron and steel industry has set up a committee charged with the duty of producing a scheme of reorganisation, and a preliminary report was issued early last year. Under the Coal Mines Act of 1930 the Coal Mines Reorganisation Committee is engaged in trying to enforce amalgamations in the coal industry. Other examples could be given of this tendency towards the emergence of similar bodies.

From this brief review it is evident that the existing efforts to guide the distribution of population are not only unco-ordinated but are sometimes aiming in wholly different directions. The de-rating action of the Government tends to centralisation, while the commendation of successive Ministers of Health, coupled with Clause 35 of the Town and County Planning Act, sets the seal of official approval upon decentralisation on the pattern of Letchworth and Welwyn. The operative sections of the Act, however valuable their results in detail, have not only done nothing effective to promote a national view of distribution but have produced a state of things that we were led to call the very negation of planning. Finally, wholly dissociated from the official scheme of planning, new bodies, mostly unofficial, are at work, and will, should they be successful, effectively influence population distribution.

If we are to work our way out of this confusion towards a clearer policy, it is desirable to discover how the present state of things arose. The town planning idea seems to have originated among certain people of public spirit, who longed to put an end to the chaos of modern urban development. They were imbued with civic and æsthetic ideals but had little touch with industry, and lacked knowledge of certain fields—such as vital statistics. Town planning left out the industrialist and the expert. In partial explanation of this it may be said that the experts were not very forthcoming with proffered assistance, and that only recently have industrialists been organised on a scale large enough to make planning in concert with them possible. However that may be, town planning had, and still has, certain grave defects when regarded as a mechanism for guiding the distribution of population. There is no central co-ordination; the effort begins, in fact, at the wrong end—with details about small areas and not with the needs of the country as a whole. The areas planned are administrative and not industrial, and there should be no need to stress the fact that location of industry determines location of population. Lastly, there is no contact with those who alone have the power to determine where opportunities for employment should be created or withdrawn. We have illustrated this last point by reference to industrial development ; it is apparently equally true that town planning has been out of touch with the development of power and transport facilities.

It follows that if there is to be any effective planning of the distribution of population, there must be central co-ordination and that the relevant experts and the industrialists must be drawn in. If the experts were drawn in, there would be an end of the absurdity of planning for tens of millions who will never see the light of day. If the industrialists were drawn in, then planning would go forward in concert with those who have the power to withdraw the opportunities for employment for a whole town or district. If they are absent from the councils of those who plan, planning must be ineffective and may be merely a farce.

It is not possible to do more here than make a few remarks about the methods and aims of the planning organisations of the future. " Guidance " is perhaps a better word than " planning." The dangers of rigid planning schemes are evident enough; they may make impossible that elasticity which is indispensible for successful industrial effort. Also, under a system of industry conducted by private enterprise, it is necessary that decisions as to the location of industry should remain largely unfettered. What is in mind, is this. Industries, spontaneously, and of their own free will, are beginning to organise themselves and to scheme for their future. The aim should be to ensure that the decisions taken by industries are arrived at in full view of all the relevant facts and relevant considerations—the estimated future population, its division by sex and age, the schemes of power and transport organisations, the plans of other industries, the civic and æsthetic aspects, and so on.

It may be urged that there will always be important industrial effort which has not reached, or is of such a nature that it will never reach, a stage when central organisation comes into being, and that therefore there will always be a field of industry lying outside the sphere of guidance. While there is truth in this, the fact is that already the vast majority of employed persons are in the service of industries which are either centrally organised or are ripe for such organisation. The number of those employed, at any one time, by new industries is relatively negligible. In other words, the objection to planning on the grounds that you must allow freedom to the new industry to grow where it wishes and that, in consequence, your plan is always liable to break down, is of no serious moment.

If a central organisation for consultation and guidance as to the future distribution of population comes into being, it must be informed by some definite aim. The experience of the past points decisively in one direction. On all grounds there is an overwhelming case for decentralisation, and this should be the general aim. There is danger of a serious misdirection of natural effort. We seem about to make a real attempt to reduce overcrowding in our huge concentrations of population—but by extending them still further. What seems likely to happen is that, though housing in a narrow sense may be improved, congestion in these centres will be considerably increased. In many cases plans are being laid to house people where they cannot be employed. In other cases, even though the chance of employment may exist, it would be far better if the employment was provided elsewhere. And the possibility of planning where employment shall be provided is now coming within our grasp. The aim should therefore be to drain away as many persons as possible to new centres of population and industry.

The bearing of planning upon the existing form of local government also requires notice. Any centralised official planning is bound to raise the question of local government. At present there are bodies which are able to make or unmake the prosperity of towns and districts by their decisions as to where works shall be closed down or moved to. So long as these bodies remain outside any official scheme, and local authorities are able to advertise for new industries, however illusory such independence may be, there is a general impression that, if misfortune overtakes a locality, the blame cannot be fixed upon anyone. But if such decisions were to emanate from an official organisation, and if some localities were told that they must decrease while others increased, these blows would no longer be borne in silence. Indeed, the whole basis of existing local government would be undermined. And planning with a stationary or declining population must aggravate the situation because increase at any one point must imply decrease elsewhere. Hitherto, with a growing population, rapid increase at one place has merely implied less rapid growth in other places.

Awkward as these issues are, they would not be created by what is proposed; they would merely be brought to light. At present they are concealed. The truth is, that present administrative areas do not coincide with industrial areas; even if they were made to do so, it is doubtful whether local administrative machinery should, in any way, be responsible for industrial development. The location of industry should be decided on national grounds, and local administration should come in when these decisions have been taken. This is intended to imply in general that local administration should neither be financially penalised by nor advantaged by industrial planning, over which it can, and should, exercise no control. How much local autonomy it is possible to have, and what form it could take under these circumstances, is too large a matter for discussion here. It is merely suggested that an end should be put to the existing sham which, while it gives apparent latitude to local authorities for industrial planning, allows all effective powers to be exercised by other bodies.

UNVEILING OF PORTRAIT OF MR. GODDARD.

The PRESIDENT expressed the pleasure which all the members felt at Mr. Goddard's presence among them that evening.

Members would, he said, remember that the Council had decided to have Mr. Goddard's portrait painted as a lasting memorial of his great services to The Institution. Mr. Oswald Birley, whose fame as a painter was well known, and who was present that evening, had been duly commissioned, and had now completed his work. As President for the time being, it was his privilege and pleasure to unveil the portrait.

[The PRESIDENT then unveiled the portrait amid prolonged applause.]

Continuing, he said he would be voicing the opinion of all the members when he congratulated Mr. Birley on having produced a fine piece of work. He would now formally present the portrait to Mr. Goddard, on behalf of all chartered surveyors, young and old, at home and abroad, to whom Mr. Goddard had been guide, philosopher and friend during the twenty-seven years for which he had acted as Secretary of The Institution.

Mr. ALEXANDER GODDARD, C.B.E., who was received with prolonged applause, said it was extraordinarily difficult for him to express in words the appreciation which he felt of the honour which the Council and the members had done him that evening in placing his portrait in their picture gallery, to hang there, as the President had said, for ever. When he looked round the walls that evening and saw the portraits which were already there, among others, those of John Clutton, the founder of The Institution; of his old friend Daniel Watney, who for many years was looked upon as the connecting link between the past generation and the present; of Howard Martin, who made history as the first of the official arbitrators; and of Sir John Oakley—personally he never thought the artist had done justice to Sir John—who was their distinguished President in the jubilee year of The Institution, it made him extremely proud to feel that they had thought enough of him to allow his portrait to have a place amongst those members who in the past had given such unstinted service to The Institution.

He did not propose to make a speech that evening ; he had sung his swan song over twelve months ago, but he would like to say how pleasant it was to come back and see so many old friends and to receive such a warm welcome. He did not know whether the members realised it, but it meant a great deal to anyone coming back in such circumstances to find everyone ready to hold out a hand and say how glad they were to see him back. It was very pleasant, too, to think that for generations in the future the old connection between himself and The Institution would be continued by the portrait which would hang on its walls. He hoped that someone in the future, the son or the grandson of someone present, perhaps, would go round and say "That is a nice "portrait by Oswald Birley ; that was the second Secretary, "Goddard by name, and I always have heard that he and his "predecessor, Julian Rogers, and that other man over there, "Killick, his successor, always tried to do their best for The "Institution." If that were his reputation for the future, he would be very happy indeed. He was extraordinarily proud of the compliment which had been paid him that evening, and he wished all the members a very happy and prosperous New Year. (Applause.)

A DISCUSSION took place on Professor A. M. CARR-SAUNDERS' Paper entitled

PLANNING IN RELATION TO FUTURE POPULATION.

Mr. FRANK HUNT, C.V.O. (Member of Council), said it was his privilege to move a hearty vote of thanks to Professor Carr-Saunders for the Paper he had prepared. The members of The Institution always felt grateful to those who prepared Papers for their consideration, but in the case of members of their own profession, and particularly of The Institution, that feeling of gratitude was qualified by the fact that it was a duty which a member of The Institution owed to his profession. Professor Carr-Saunders would remember the words with which the first chapter of a book, The Professions, recently published under his name, stated that fact in terms which personally he had not met before. Bacon said: "I hold every man a debtor to his "profession," and that had always been his own view of the duty of members of The Institution in the way of doing what was necessary to further their profession. When, however, the members had the advantage of listening to a Paper from one who was not of their number, their feeling of gratitude was intensified, and he was sure that would be the view taken by those present that evening when the President came to put the vote of thanks to the meeting.

The second point which occurred to him on reading the Paper, was that it was good that members of a professional institution should have put to them, from a new angle, questions with which it was their daily duty to struggle. It was probably true that Professor Carr-Saunders had written his Paper in the serenity of his study in Liverpool University, far away from the distractions of the hard rough-and-tumble of life to which surveyors were accustomed. Members of The Institution, however, belonging as they did to a profession which, above all others, was thought to be a practical one, had to test the ideas put before them by the hard facts of everyday work, and if in the few minutes which remained to him he took up a standpoint which might appear to be critical, it was only because he wished to elucidate some points upon which Professor Carr-Saunders might be able to be of assistance.

He would like to assure the author that practising surveyors and those concerned particularly with town planning did not shut their eyes to such matters as the trend of population, and he would dearly love to see the case where fantastic aggregations had been arranged for populations which would never exist. That might not be the exact wording of what Professor Carr-Saunders said, but it was the tenor of one sentence, at any rate, in his Paper. It was true that provisions were made for controlling the use of land for the purposes for which it was best suited, but that never meant that there was any power on earth that could compel either factories or houses to be erected unless there was a definite need for them. No doubt a subsequent speaker would be able to emphasise that particular point in a way which he himself could not do, because it so happened that his education had been woefully neglected. His ignorance on many points was large and he was quite incapable of understanding some of the things which Professor Carr-Saunders had in his mind.

In the first instance, he observed it was said that we could control population. When he read that, he wondered whether it would not have been helpful if the lecturer had defined the word "we," because he (the speaker) noticed that in the first instance he used it in the sense of two or three being gathered together to consider a particular problem, but in the next sentence it was said that " we " could control the death rate. He wondered who the " we " was there ; nobody had any control over that. It was also stated that " we " chose the size of families, and there again he wondered what authority outside the couple joined together in matrimony had anything to do with choosing the size of the family. He understood what the author said as to the desirability on other grounds of increasing or diminishing the size of families on the average, but he knew of no authority in the kingdom which had any power to control—and that meant compel—the production of families of any average size for the sake of maintaining the population. Similarly he had a little doubt as to the use of the word " we " in connection with the question of the distribution of population. It had to be remembered that the population consisted of living people, and if Professor Carr-Saunders had any practical experience of trying to shift even a limited number of people out of a slum into better quarters he would realise that the personal element was one of the biggest things that had to be combated. Again, another phrase gave the idea that " we " were able in some sense to influence the quality of the population or of families. There might be quite a simple explanation of that, and if there was he would be strengthened in his belief that he had truly described himself a moment ago as incapable of understanding certain points.

The other word regarding which he would like a little help was " planning," because, if he read the Paper aright, there was a suggestion that they could plan. That again, to his mind, must mean some actual practical operation, not merely the setting forth of a view or the drawing of lines on paper, but some actual practical steps which could be taken to reduce, or increase or stabilise population and to compel the distribution of it in the way that someone or other thought right. In that connection it was suggested that Letchworth and Welwyn showed how it was possible to plan for distribution. It was true that Letchworth and Welwyn had shown that one could start a town in the middle of fields, but he wondered how Letchworth could have helped in dealing with the increase in the population of Greater London during the period for which Letchworth had been in existence. So far as he knew from the latest figures available, there were 3,800 houses in Letchworth. Assuming that half of those were houses suitable for the occupation of persons belonging to the working classes, and excluding the War years, that meant that in twenty-three years some 1,900 houses had been built, and that worked out at the provision of eighty houses a year for persons of the working classes. When one put that against the fact that in the course of the years since the War 400,000 houses had been built in Greater London to meet the needs of London, it would be seen that Letchworth was not likely to help very much in the provision of the accommodation needed for the growth of only one big city.

It was suggested that there was an optimum size for a town. He agreed that there was much to be said on both sides, but again he would deal with the purely practical side of the matter, with which, as surveyors, the members were perhaps all obsessed: How were they going to prevent the growth of any of the big cities in England? Elizabeth had tried to do it for London, but apparently without success, though things were very much easier then than they were to-day. It was further suggested that when a town got beyond a population of 250,000 the cost of services increased, but he had never yet seen any figures which justified that conclusion. The real point was that when one got into big towns one found the costs widely different, because not only the extent but the quality of the services rendered was so different, and he thought it was not quite proper to say that the cost of the government of the big towns was necessarily largely in excess of that of the smaller towns, for, if there were any difference, it was because the services rendered and the quality of those services were so largely different. There was only one other point, perhaps, with which he had time to deal, and that was the suggestion that town planning was commencing at the wrong end. He had read that section of the Paper with very great care, because it was a question in which he was somewhat interested, particularly on the local government side. The only conclusion to which he came in the end was this, that the whole of the organisation of the kingdom would need to be upset and something fresh designed to take its place ; the whole of the tradition of local government would have to go. He wondered at the end whether the only way in which the views expressed by Professor Carr-Saunders, however desirable they might be, could be achieved was by some conception of a Socialist State, perhaps on the lines, so far as one knew them, of what was happening in the Soviet Republic, where people did exactly what they were told, worked where they were told to work and produced for the future when they were told to, so that very little was left in the way of independent action on the part of any portion of the community. He might be quite wrong, but that was the only way he could see by which the planning suggested in the Paper could be made effective.

While saying that, he did not in any sense withdraw a word of what he had said to begin with, namely, that the thanks of The Institution were due to Professor Carr-Saunders for his Paper. If the Professor had had the same effect on the minds of the other nine thousand members of The Institution as he had had on his own, he should be quite satisfied as to the cumulative result of his Paper. Before concluding, he would like to add this. Professor Carr-Saunders had recently been responsible for a book on the professions. He had looked through that part of the book which related to the profession of the surveyor, and would like to congratulate him upon putting in a short space a very complete and interesting account of their constitution and their aims in the community of the professions.

Mr. THOMAS ADAMS (Fellow), in seconding the vote of thanks, said the Paper was very provocative of thought and ably presented, and if on some points he felt obliged, like Mr. Hunt, to express some difference of opinion, he would equally express his appreciation, with the utmost sincerity, of the enjoyment which the Paper had given him and the benefit he had received from its study.

He wholly agreed with the author of the Paper upon the need of more comprehensiveness in town planning. Town planning was too limited in its scope in certain economic phases with which he had dealt in a Paper before The Institution the previous year. In order to deal adequately with industry it was necessary to consider the question from a national point of view.

Density and distribution were not the same thing. There was such a thing as control of local density, which was an entirely different matter from control of large-scale distribution of population in regions and cities and large rural districts, although, of course, local density affected distribution. He thought the two things should be kept separate when discussing the effect of town planning on the question of the distribution of the population.

It was there that, if he might say so, he quarrelled with one or two points in the Paper. In the planning of New York two eminent professors of the John Hopkins University had made an estimate of the prospective growth of the New York region up to the year 1965. The then population of the region approached 11,000,000, and they estimated that by 1965 it would be 21,000,000. That had not proved to be an extravagant estimate up to date, for the population had grown precisely as was predicted ; but the town planners' estimate was about 14,500,000, and he ventured to say now that the present tendencies showed that the town planners rather than the population experts were likely to be correct. He mentioned that to show, not that the town planners might be right and the population experts wrong, but that the question was one on which it was not possible to get any precise information.

The point of interest, however, was the effect which that estimate had on the town planners, and the effect was almost nil. The plan prepared for the New York region would provide for a population of 25 or 30 million people. The region was planned to take care of 12 million, 14 million, 20 million, or 30 million, and the plan had to be the same no matter what the population was likely to be. It had to provide for a hundred possibilities, one of which was that the population might decline, while another was that it might increase to the extent of the most extravagant estimate. That was the point of planning ; one did not plan for arbitrary but for elastic conditions. If a plan became stereotyped it was of no use ; it was nothing more than an attempt to petrify conditions which were essentially dynamic.

He happened to be interested in the planning of Bexhill, a town of about 8,000 acres, with a population of 21,000 odd. Assuming that Bexhill grew to three or four times its present population, the acreage it would require for an average density of even 25 people to the acre would be 4,000 acres, taking a population of 100,000. Was it suggested that building should be prohibited on the other 4,000 acres, or how was the matter to be dealt with in a practical way? If 4,000 acres were left undetermined, it would attract a greater density than if it were laid down that it must be restricted to two, four or six houses to the acre over the whole of the area. In the latter case one was not encouraging development to prevent the density from being excessive on more area than was required for the prospective population. It was certain that the number of people who would come to Bexhill would be no greater and no less as a result, except in so far as the work was well done and encouraged new development. In town planning schemes they could not determine the precise area on which the population predicted by the expert should be accommodated. All surveyors knew that development did not take place precisely where one expected it, looking forward for a period of even ten years. It might be necessary to provide, perhaps, ten times the area that would probably be required for the growth of a small community because one did not know exactly what would happen. For example, the owner of a large estate might die and the estate come into the market immediately, and all the circumstances would be entirely changed because of that one factor, and if that estate were left as an agricultural area, undetermined as to its density, the effect would be the exact opposite of what Professor Carr-Saunders desired.

Under present conditions it was necessary to include all land and define the limits of density on all the land, no matter whether the population was going to go there or not. He would like to suggest that those who looked at a town planning scheme and said " Here we find that this plan for the surroundings of, say, "the city of Oxford, provides for a population which is entirely "impossible in the next two hundred years" were criticising something about which they knew nothing. The restriction of density provided nothing more than that, if building were undertaken, the number of houses per acre must not be increased beyond a certain number, according to the town planning scheme.

There was this qualification to be made. If it were practicable to define areas permanently as agricultural, that would go a long way towards removing the misunderstanding about the necessity of restricting density on all land in town planning schemes; but that could be done only by agreement between the owners and the authorities that such restriction would not involve loss to the owners. He thought that, along with the present constructive policy for the development of agriculture, the time had almost come when the most fertile areas in the country should be surveyed for the purpose of keeping them permanently for the production of food. That was one of the directions in which town and country planning should be extended and developed, so as to bring agriculture into the purview of town planning schemes.

The Very Rev. Dean INGE, K.C.V.O., D.D. (Dean of St. Paul's), said he had read the Paper with the great interest and admiration which he always felt for everything that Professor Carr-Saunders wrote, but there were one or two small criticisms which he would like to make. They dealt not with town planning, of which he knew really nothing, but with population. It was stated in the Paper that the decline in the birth rate had been as marked in agricultural countries as in the dense populations of the Old World, but he thought that that was really a mistake. He would give a list of countries which at present had a very high birth rate of 40 and upwards, omitting one or two small ones, such as Bulgaria. These were the French Canadians, the Dutch Boers, the Russian moujiks, the Indian ryots, and the Egyptian fellahin—in every case peasants living at a very low standard of comfort. One could also take the case, for example, of Germany. The fall in the birth rate in the large towns of Germany since the War had been catastrophic; in Berlin the birth rate was not much over 10 per thousand, but in the country districts, and especially those inhabited by Poles, one still got a fairly high birth rate of about 25. He thought, therefore, it might be accepted as the law that the high birth rate existed only in peasant countries, where the standard of living was low. It might be asked how one accounted, in that case, for the extraordinary increase in the population of industrialist England during the last century. The answer was really very simple: the conditions were such as had never existed before and could never exist again. For about fifty years England was the workshop of the world, and in that way a vast population was called into existence ; but those conditions no longer existed and they would never exist again. This country was no longer the workshop of the world ; the tendency to-day was for every country to try, as far as possible, to be self-sufficient, and the result of that must be a more equable distribution of the population over the globe. They should no longer have dense aggregations such as existed in England, the most thickly populated country in the world, with 750 inhabitants to the square mile.

All through the Paper there was an assumption that a decrease in the population would be a misfortune. In a sense he agreed with that. The proper remedy was State colonisation, which would be quite feasible. There was plenty of empty good land in the Dominions, and, except for the fact that no longer was a good pioneer type bred and that people would not emigrate but preferred to stay at home, even if it meant going on the dole, and except also for the fact that the Dominions and foreign countries would not have them, there was no reason why such colonisation should not take place. That being so, he was afraid there was no alternative but to accept what he was very sorry to regard as a necessity, namely, a rather drastic reduction in our swollen population, which, as he had already said, had been brought into existence by circumstances which could never recur. If that were so, then a reduction in the birth rate was by far the best way of reducing the population.

It was difficult to predict what the future might be, but personally he thought that the decline would begin roughly about 1940, and he did not think it need be regretted. He thought this would be a happier country with only about 30,000,000 people, all employed, all fairly well paid, and not overcrowded, and with, as he hoped, a fairly short day's work, and opportunities for leisure. That was a state of things to which he looked forward, but he did not think it could be brought about if the advice of some were followed and a further increase in the population encouraged.

He was afraid that had not very much bearing on town planning, but it was a respectful criticism of one or two points in a Paper which he was sure all those present, in common with himself, had admired very much.

Professor JULIAN HUXLEY, M.A. (Visitor), the well-known biologist and writer, said that he had recently had the interesting task of going round the country on behalf of the B.B.C. and looking at a great number of scientific institutions and different kinds of scientific work, and one of the things that had struck him very forcibly had been much of the scientific and applied scientific work going on in this country was lopsided. It was over-developed on the side of industry, rather so on the side of war, medium on the side of agriculture, a bit inadequate on the side of health, and the rest nowhere. The biological and especially the human sciences were very much under-developed in relation to the physical and chemical sciences, engineering, and so forth.

There were obvious historical reasons for that. The great incentive to the prosecution of scientific work on a large scale, involving the expenditure of much money, had come, on the one hand, from the profit motive, which had operated chiefly in industry, and from the incentives inherent in the State, the incentive to improvement in warlike operations, and incentives like that which largely led to the establishment of the census—of wanting to know about the population for the purpose of taxing it. However, since those two main types of scientific research and the scientific ascertainment of facts were started, there had been a good deal of work done on the less organised types of industry, such as agriculture, forestry, and so on, and a certain amount in recent years organised from the end of the consumer rather than the producer, such as the Building Research Station under the Department of Scientific and Industrial Research. The structure, however, remained very lopsided.

On the other hand, largely as a result of that historical development, a stage had been reached which a writer had happily called " the invention of invention." It had been discovered not merely that they could invent, but that there was such a thing as organised scientific research, which itself would automatically invent new inventions. A stage had been reached when they had discovered how to apply organised team-work on a large scale for the solution of long-range problems and to interests where no immediate profit incentive was visible.

When Professor Carr-Saunders spoke of controlling population, he was doubtless not thinking of compulsion but broadly of influencing it in various ways, some more and some less direct, but he would leave him to deal with that point. He thought it was clear that influence could be brought to bear by more or less indirect methods on problems like that of population quality and growth.

They were at the end of an epoch ; clearly things were changing very rapidly, and they were approaching the beginning of a new epoch in which planning was necessary. They already saw it beginning to operate in one big field, namely, that of agriculture, where attempts were being made to organise agricultural industries on a very large scale, with quotas, restrictions, and so on, and it seemed to him that people must aim at something along those lines in other fields as well, including the field of population. That was what was meant in general by applying planning and the scientific method in the field of population.

But what about more particular problems for the future? For one thing, it was possible to amplify the work of the census. The census was, first of all, a simple counting of heads. It then began to enumerate more things, and in 1911 it launched out into a very interesting line of investigation by attempting to classify the people in this country into economic or social classes or grades, largely by income and the type of occupation, and some extremely interesting things were discovered, for instance, about their birth rates. It was discovered that the net increase of the lowest paid economic grade of the five into which the population was classified was just about double that of the uppermost. It would be extremely important to have information of that type again, but, instead of that, it had been discontinued since 1911, on the ground of economy.

All such work, of course, was in the nature of social or sociological research. It was an extraordinary fact that the number of professional sociologists who were doing research work on the subject in this country was a mere handful, smaller than the number of trained chemists in many single works' laboratories, and far less than the number of trained chemists in any big university. Social science in this country was in embryo and there was practically no State research on this subject. It was desirable to have the idea of scientific method introduced into the field of population and inter-related subjects, and that meant, first and foremost, the collection of scientifically ascertained facts. His friends who were interested in housing problems told him that one of the great difficulties of the slum problem was that a great many elementary facts which ought to be ascertainable—e.g., about the ownership of slum land—were, in fact, not known. It would be extremely interesting to hear someone deal with the matter from that point of view.

Then there was the whole question of the quality and quantity of the population. Other speakers had said or implied that one could not plan ahead or get accurate estimates, and that, even if one could, it was necessary to be very elastic. That was true within limits, but as an example to the contrary one might take the fact that there had been a sudden swing over of policy on the part of various authorities concerned with providing educational buildings on realising what they ought to have known before, that the number of children of school age was going to be very much smaller instead of going on increasing in future. That was a case where definitely one could fit one's plans to one's facts if the facts were available.

One could make investigations on the quality of the population. It would be extremely interesting to have a really scientific sample of the quality of the population as measured by physique, intelligence tests, performance tests of various sorts, and so on, and to have that repeated at intervals. That would be of the utmost value as a periodic stock-taking of the nation.

Then there were extremely interesting lines of work of the kind which were being carried out by Professor Carr-Saunders at the University of Liverpool and by the London School of Economics for London—restricted social surveys of different areas to see how the people lived and what their life was in relation to other problems. This work should be extended. Then it would be easy to undertake other types of surveys, such as dietary and health surveys ; indeed, a small beginning had already been made with those. It would be easy and very important to do that on a large scale, and, no doubt, health would be found to vary enormously from district to district.

Sir FRANCIS FREMANTLE, O.B.E., M.P. (Chairman of Parliamentary Medical Committee, Director of Welwyn Garden City), joined with previous speakers in thanking Professor Carr-Saunders most profoundly for his Paper, and in congratulating The Institution on having secured his presence to open the discussion on such a wide range of subjects.

He was glad that Professor Carr-Saunders had emphasised the necessity, as Mr. Adams and other speakers had done, of town planning being elastic. He recognised the need for that personally more than ever since that morning he found that town planning had come to his little family estate, and he discovered he was down to bed-rock in resisting the town planners, of whom, hitherto, he had been one. Town planning must be elastic, and therefore he liked Professor Carr-Saunders' original contribution to the subject in suggesting the term " town guidance " rather than " town planning." The name could not now be changed since it was already statutory, but " guidance " was the proper word.

There were one or two matters regarding which he differed from the reader of the Paper. It was surely impossible to suggest that local authorities should not compete in the matter of attracting industry and population. He could not conceive how otherwise one could expect to get the proper distribution of industry ; there must, first of all, be the freedom for industry for which Professor Carr-Saunders pleaded, and, secondly, there must be the initiative on the part of local authorities to develop their area and make it fit and attractive for industry. If that were done, it seemed to him it would meet one of the points raised by the reader of the Paper, namely, that local authorities must reserve a maximum of space for those parts of the population which they wished to attract. If they wished to attract a residential population, they must reserve a large amount and large varieties of area and space for their residential population ; if they wished to attract a working-class population, they must do the same thing for that population ; if they wished to attract an industrial population, they must reserve a large and varied amount of space for that purpose. It was not a proper criticism of the system of town planning to say that something like ten to forty times the area which would eventually be required for industry was being reserved in town plans for that particular purpose so long as the plans were sufficiently elastic as to allow of their adaptation as the years went by.

Mr. Hunt had referred to his own pet child, the garden city, and had said that Letchworth was only a drop in the ocean as a contribution to the problem. That was, of course, the case. Many prophets had been only a drop in the ocean of the world's talk, and yet had had a wonderful effect. Letchworth and Welwyn had been and were a guide and a shining star to the surveyors of the country and to the whole of the planning world and the building world, and were intended to be such and never intended to be anything more.

He entirely endorsed what Professor Carr-Saunders said about the need of planning from a national standpoint, provided one were not going to take away the responsibilities and the opportunities of local authorities for planning, nor the opportunities of industry and private enterprise and private owners for playing their part in future developments. National planning was, in fact, going on now ; it was started last year on a practical scale by the Government Departments working on a plan in order to bring together industry and planning. The groundwork for that national planning was being done and would be published very shortly, and he thought that would provide the basis of what was required and desired by Professor Carr-Saunders.

Mr. T. ALWYN LLOYD (President, Town Planning Institute) said he thought that a most important part of what Professor Carr-Saunders said was his reference to the necessity for a new approach to planning. He thought town planners had to plead guilty to a certain stereotyping of plan ; too many of the town and regional planning schemes in recent years suffered from that defect, and that brought him to what Professor Carr-Saunders and others had said as to the necessity at the present stage for a national survey. He would prefer to refer to it at the present stage as a national survey rather than as national planning. because it seemed to him that that was what was required beyond anything else. It was not so much the technical planning which was needed, for which there was adequate machinery, but it was the getting together of the necessary information on a national scale as to the conditions and resources of Britain, and that information could be got together only in that comprehensive way. It was quite impossible for the innumerable local authorities to do it, and it was not reasonable to expect the Ministry of Health, as the chief town planning authority, to do it, because they had to act as judges of the various schemes put up by the local authorities.

Mr. Adams had referred to the importance not only of dove-tailing industry into town planning, but of dove-tailing the most important of all the industries, agriculture, into national and local planning. Unfortunately, until recently agriculture had had no recognised place in town and country planning ; in fact its usual part had been that of an opponent of urban building schemes. The average agriculturist, whether owner or tenant-farmer, had tended in the past to look upon town planning as mere town extension, and, therefore, as something with which he was not concerned, and he had in consequence naturally been rather jealous of the inroads of urbanism into his much prized agricultural land. If it were possible as part of a national survey to see that the best agricultural land was used for agriculture in the future, and not for building or for other purposes to which in their extravagant British way they frequently put it, he thought that would be all to the good. Round London, for instance, hundreds of acres of most valuable actual or potential farm land had been squandered for building when other equally suitable, but not so valuable, land could have been used for the purpose.

No doubt Professor Carr-Saunders and others would emphasise the fact that while the problems of an increasing population did not trouble them to the extent that it did a few years ago, the problem of the larger number of single families was still a very important one from the point of view of planning, and particularly as it affected housing. Although the population might be stationary, or declining, the number of individual families had increased very considerably between the two census periods, and might well increase still further in the future.

Professor C. B. FAWCETT, D.SC. (Professor of Geography, University of London) (Visitor), said he would like to deal with some of the facts of the distribution of population and its bearing on the questions under discussion. The degree of concentration into big cities had been under-estimated, partly because the census gave the population in terms of local government areas, while in several parts of the country one would find towns which were separate for the purposes of local government and of the census, crowded together in big continuous urban areas, which elsewhere he had called conurbations. If one measured them up, as he had attempted to do in some recent work,* one found that in the seven principal conurbations in this country there was contained just over 40 per cent. of our total population. Instead of thinking of the population as 80 per cent. urban it was worth while to think of 40 per cent. as living in seven big conurbations: Greater London, Greater Manchester, Greater Birmingham, West Yorkshire (the cluster about Leeds and Bradford), Glasgow, Merseyside, and Tyneside.

At the present time in the modern world there were nearly sixty conurbations, each of which had a million inhabitants or more. That was a trend which he thought would continue—increasing clustering of the population in a small number of very populous centres.

With that in mind he looked at the figure suggested as an ideal size for a town. Professor Carr-Saunders ventured on a figure of 200,000 to 250,000. If one took twelve houses to the acre, and also assumed a family of five to a house, which was rather above the present average, and then took the other side of the question, that of the area of land which such a town of 200,000 people distributed at the rate of twelve houses and 60 people to the acre would occupy, one would find that it needed about 50 square miles of land. That happened to be nearly the area of the city of Leeds. Leeds had a population of a little less than half a million, and not all the land inside its boundaries was built on, but if one had 200,000 people in it at that density it would be filled up, and the people in the centre of the city would be four miles from the open country, while the people on the outskirts would be four miles away from the central area in which the commercial and industrial life of the city would be concentrated. He suggested that those considerations of area and distance were fundamental to the problems of planning and of distribution.

If one could imagine our big cities reduced to that ideal magnitude and our population living in cities of about that size, then, apart from the barren Highlands which were at present practically uninhabited, and were likely to remain so, one-quarter of the whole of the rest of England would be required for that particular urban occupation. And it should be noted that that was for residential occupation only ; nothing had been said of the space occupied by factories and warehouses, by stations and garages, shops and offices, schools and theatres, &c.

* See "The Distribution of the Urban Population in Great Britain, 1931," in the Geographical Journal, February, 1932.

It was of interest to consider, in relation to the planning of a town and its services, the area of the town as well as its population. Although it had almost the same population as Leeds, Praha, the capital of Czechoslovakia, had a built-on area occupying much less ground than that of Leeds—perhaps a third as much. And that brought him to his second point. It was possible to house the population in very different fashions, and there were in fact two main trends in housing arrangements. There was the traditional English system of the one-family house, the ideal that each family should have a house with a small garden attached to it as a private domain. Some people were inclined to think of that as the inevitable and natural ideal of distribution of population ; but in fact in the towns not peopled by races of English descent, and in an enormous number of rural areas throughout the rest of the world, that system did not exist and was hardly even dreamed of ; it was much more customary to have many families in one large building, the type of housing which had come into our cities as the " block of flats," the American " apartment-" house," the " tenements " characteristic of the Scottish cities, which, it must be remembered, to a large extent had a different housing tradition from the English. Obviously, if the population of a town were housed almost wholly in huge blocks of tenements, it would be possible to accommodate the population on a smaller ground area, and also there would be shorter roadways to be maintained and a saving in the length of cables, sewers, and so on.

At the other extreme there was the city of Melbourne in Australia, which, with approximately one million people, covered about as much ground as London. It was built on the English one-family house system ; but many of the houses were of bungalow type.

The two trends were clearly visible in the spread of housing round London to-day, and also round other towns. One saw the spreading out of row after row of comparatively small houses, each occupied by one family, the traditional one-family house with space round it. In the opposite direction was the erection of more and more blocks of flats, where a considerable number of families were housed, with fewer of the amenities of the open country, but nearer to their work and to urban attractions. And the attractions of an urban centre were a very real factor in the social and sociological life of the people. After all, man was a gregarious animal, and the majority of human beings seemed to prefer to live near to other human beings.

Those two trends were visible up and down the country, and which was the stronger was a matter to be determined by most careful observation of the facts.

They were essentially social trends. He did not know whether the town planner could do much to influence them, but the relative predominance of one or the other in the immediate future would influence very considerably all the work which the town planners would have to do. If it were possible to forecast which would prevail, that would provide a guide of incalculable value to future planning.

There was one other small matter to which he would like to refer. There had been some reference to what was commonly called the " satellite town," the creation of new urban centres, of which Letchworth was the outstanding and first example.

The tendency of industrial development was towards a relative diminution in the number of workers in the fundamental heavy industries and an increase in the number of workers engaged in the clerical and distributive sides of national work. Those belonging to the second groups were almost inevitably bound to work in close relation to the great commercial centres. It was much more possible to spread out the lighter industries into such centres as Letchworth, definitely planned satellite towns, than it was to spread out either the heavy industries or what in the widest sense he might call the commercial workers, and in that respect it was worth while to remember that the commercial workers were increasing relatively to the industrial workers, though that was a statement for which it was not possible to give reasons that evening.

The PRESIDENT then put the vote of thanks, which was carried with prolonged applause.

The following written reply has been received from Professor CARR-SAUNDERS :—

It is not possible for me to do justice to the interesting discussion that followed my Paper ; that would demand more space than I can reasonably ask for. I do not propose to discuss the many valuable points made by speakers who carried the matter further, especially Professor Huxley's advocacy of the need for social research and Professor Fawcett's point about density. The importance of the remarks of the latter speaker can hardly be exaggerated. It is a fact of great significance that the housing habits of the most densely populated country in the world are of the sprawling kind. I must confine myself to an attempt to answer some of the criticisms of what I said.

It would not be difficult, though it might be invidious, to give example schemes which envisage fantastic future populations. I can assure Mr. Hunt that I can give him references if he wants them. Mr. Hunt also asked for particulars of research into the problem of the optimum size of town: there is an interesting Paper on this matter by Ashmore Baker in the Journal of the Statistical Society for the year 1910-1911. He is troubled by my use of the word "we" in certain passages. In general by "we" is meant the community, though when speaking of the size of family "we" sometimes means parents. I tried to make the distinction clear in my Paper and I said that "we" (= the community) can only control quantity indirectly (e.g., by family allowances), although "we" (= the parents) do control the size of family directly. In spite of Mr. Hunt's remarks I still maintain that "we" (= the community) can influence the quality of the population and can control the death-rate.

In regard to the first matter, the grounds for my belief are that genius and idiocy have a basis in inheritance, and that we can certainly prevent the propagation of idiots and perhaps encourage the propagation of genius, and thereby change the average quality of the population. We can control the death-rate (I did not say determine the death-rate) by the application of medical science. It is surely enough to contrast the expectation of life in this country (about 60 years), where medical science is widely used, with that in India (about 25 years), where medical science has for the most part yet to apply to the needs of the people, in order to make the point. I also still maintain that control and compel are not synonymous, and in that opinion I have the support of all makers of dictionaries. But makers of dictionaries no doubt do their work in the serenity of their studies, and this would, perhaps, make them suspect to Mr. Hunt.

It is quite true to say, as Mr. Adams has said, that regulations restricting density in any area does not mean that a certain number of people will inhabit that area, and that, as Mr. Hunt has said, reservation of areas for industry will not mean that industry will be established there. But my point is that regulations and restrictions of this kind are not planning. In fact they imply that national planning is out of the picture. I agree with Mr. Lloyd as to the need of a national survey as a first step, and I would plead for the inclusion of industrialists in the making of such a survey. A new start in the matter of national planning for land utilisation is required, and the industrialists must be interested from the outset. For it is he who wields the power. I am inclined to suspect that there is more potential sympathy with large-scale planning among industrialists than among town planners.

Sir Francis Fremantle has answered the criticism that Letchworth and Welwyn have achieved little numerically. What they have shown, however, is how infinitely better it would have been if the 400,000 new houses in the London area had been distributed in new Letchworths and Welwyns than in those unpromising suburbs which threaten to choke London. With regard to the difficulty of moving people from the slums to the new housing areas, of which I am not ignorant, I do not see how this bears upon the question of the redistribution of the population in the broad sense in which I was discussing the problem.

With regard to Dr. Inge's point about the decline of the birth-rate in agricultural countries, it seems that my remarks misled him owing to their condensation. It is quite true, as he says, that in most countries, though not in this, the rural birth-rate is significantly higher than the urban birth-rate. But I had in mind those countries of Western Europe and their derivatives overeas, where the birth-rate has declined as a whole. The decline has been greater in the urbanised countries than in the agricultural countries and in the town as compared with the land in any of these countries. But my point was that, in this group of countries the small family habit has spread as fashions have spread, irrespective, generally speaking, of economic conditions. We all know that new fashions take a longer time to penetrate the country than the town, and it is only in this limited sense that the influence of rural conditions is of importance.

The following written communication has been received from Mr. Percy J. Waldram (Chartered Surveyor):—

It is with great regret that I find myself unable to thank Professor Carr-Saunders personally for the new light which his Paper throws upon problems of vital interest to surveyors, and no less to this country at large. The Paper constitutes an addition to our Transactions of no small value, and will doubtless be quoted extensively in connection with town planning questions and particularly with regard to overbuilding.

On page 77 the author points out that the larger the town the worse is the health of the townspeople. May I venture to add to the reasons which he adduces for this the fact that the larger the town the higher can site values be pushed in the central portions.

The direct and immediate result of high site values is to induce all interests in property to endeavour to crowd on to such costly sites the greatest possible area of lettable and rateable floor space. The result is, of course, highly unhealthy overbuilding and the C3 town population to which the author refers.

The evil is well known ; and equally well recognised is the absurdity of spending thousands, even hundreds of thousands, on hospitals and clinics for the benefit of those few more desperately stricken in the battle of life when at the same time we are rapidly undermining the resistance to disease of whole communities by blocking out light, air and sunlight essential to health with over-high and overcrowded buildings.

But arguments on behalf of public health are invariably met by the contention that overbuilding is necessary for " economic " reasons "—a vague but convincing phrase which discreetly veils the real impulse of individuals to benefit themselves at the expense of the community.

The phrase " economic reasons," rightly understood, can have only one meaning, viz., that we must plan and build for the needs of an expanding population.

Remove the bogie of an expanding population and the arguments in favour of overbuilding are reduced to ordinary stupidity. Stupidity is not enforcing a better distribution of population by firm judicious town planning, and in not restraining the efforts of individuals to benefit monetarily at the expense of the health of their neighbours.

Fortunately in this country past generations have not permitted the excesses of individualism which are to be found abroad. None of our towns have yet had to deal with the problems of three hundred thousand tenement dwelling-rooms two, three and even four rooms distant from the open air, particulars of which are to be found in the Civil Survey of New York of a few years ago, side by side with appalling statistics of mortality from consumption.

But we have the protagonists of individualism always with us, and this Paper will be a valuable corrective to their specious arguments, not only valuable in the cause of public health, but strangely enough on behalf of property values.

Experience with regard to large estates who severely restrain overbuilding even at no small immediate monetary sacrifice of ground rents has firmly convinced me of the wisdom of our brother surveyors in real estate in America who have enthusiastically welcomed " zoning " laws against overbuilding ; not from any altruistic enthusiasm as to public health, but solely because such laws operate to conserve and improve property values as a whole.

Paper 552.

GOODWILL:

With Special Reference to the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927.

By J. George Head (Chartered Surveyor).

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Chartered Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 5th February, 1934.

The Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, is the most recent of a long series of enactments directed towards an equitable adjustment of the mutual rights of Landlord and Tenant in a property in which they have common but divergent interests.

In ancient times the rights of the landlord were paramount, and those of the tenant negligible. Any value accruing to the land by virtue of the tenant's occupation, whether in the nature of fixtures or permanent improvement, passed to the landlord. To remedy this state of things, which was considered inequitable, a series of Acts was passed, of which the common object was to secure to the tenant his fair share of the value thus created. So far the subjects which were recognised as productive of additional value were of a material nature, such as fixtures, drainage or improvements executed usually by consent of the landlord.

Early in this century, however, there appeared for the first time a concession to the tenant in respect of something done without the consent of or possibly against the wishes of the landlord, and in respect of something so elusive as Goodwill. Experience has proved that in building up a business a tenant created something which might add to the value of the holding, by inducing a successor desirous of carrying on the same business to pay more rent than could be obtained from an ordinary tenant. In this way the landlord might reap an advantage from the tenant's efforts.

The subject was debated in this Institution, and an account appears in the Transactions of 25th January and 8th February, 1915, under the heading of "Report of the "Land Enquiry Commission." Bills were submitted to Parliament, but legislation did not mature till 1927. In that year the Landlord and Tenant Act was passed, and came into operation on 25th March, 1928.

An excellent digest of the Act was prepared for The Institution by Mr. Edgar Foa, Barrister-at-Law, and several text-books have been issued. To these publications the members of The Institution are referred for the legal interpretation of the Act, for the formalities which must be complied with to enable tenants to secure its benefits, and for the methods by which their claims may be resisted.

The provisions of the Act are, shortly, as follows:—

> A tenant may secure compensation for improvements carried out by him to the premises with the consent of the Tribunal ;
> A tenant may secure compensation for additional value bestowed on the premises as a direct result of the goodwill created by him ;
> A tenant may, in certain circumstances, secure a new lease ;
> Certain relief is secured to tenants with regard to dilapidations and restrictive covenants.

In the space allowed it is proposed to deal only with the question of Compensation, and particularly with that compensation which arises out of the tenant's goodwill.

Assuming that all questions of notices and legal formalities will be dealt with by the legal advisers, the Paper will be concentrated upon the practical subject of Goodwill—its nature and value—as being the keystone of the arch upon which the tenant's rights are mainly built.

The Act is not an easy one to understand, and is less easy to put into practice. Perplexities frequently arise as to the intention of the Act, but much help may be obtained in its correct interpretation if strict regard be paid to its purpose.

Its ultimate interpretation is, of course, a matter for the Court, but in the writer's view its purpose may be summarised as being:—

> That the tenant shall be recompensed in one form or another, not for what he loses by having to quit the premises, but for what the landlord will gain.

In the application of this portion of the Act (Sections 4, 5 and onwards) the first condition is that goodwill must be proved by the tenant, for without it he cannot obtain either compensation or a new lease.

Let us, therefore, investigate the nature and value of goodwill, in the first instance in general, and, secondly, in its relation to the Act.

First, then, as to GOODWILL IN GENERAL:—

The purchase of established businesses is customarily effected by the payment to the vendor of a capital sum by the purchaser in respect of "goodwill."

ITS NATURE.

What is goodwill? According to Lord Macnaghten (Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Muller & Company, 1901):—

> "It is a thing very easy to describe, very difficult to define. It is the benefit and advantage of the good name, reputation and connection of a business. It is the attractive force which brings in custom. It is the one thing which distinguishes an old-established business from a new business at its first start."

The writer has endeavoured to define "goodwill" in his Memorandum entitled "Valuation Procedure under "the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927" as follows:—

> "Goodwill to the trader arises through knowledge of him by customers to whom he becomes known, by actual transaction, by the recommendation of others, by their acquaintance with his shop, by their hearing of it from others, or through circular or advertisement. By these means may arise in the minds of such people a tendency to do further business with the trader. This tendency, although originally created by the trader's endeavour in the past, behaves eventually as if it were independent of and in addition to the result of his continuing endeavours. It acts like a flywheel, giving momentum to the machine, a momentum which is more or less enduring according to circumstances. This momentum is his goodwill."

But whatever may be the difficulty of defining "good-"will," the ascertainment of its value is a matter within the compass of a surveyor's practice.

In determining the price to be paid for goodwill, it must be remembered that the object of the purchase is the acquisition of the income derivable in respect thereof. Its value, therefore, must be governed by the same conditions which apply to other incomes, that is to say, their hazard, the trouble attendant thereon, and the length of time they may be expected to endure.

With regard to incomes arising out of land, for instance, the quality of the security determines the rate of interest expected, and the years' purchase, modified by the estimated duration of the income, follows automatically by arithmetical calculation. With regard to the purchase of a business, the same procedure is followed, but the factors which are to be used in the calculation are more difficult of ascertainment.

CONSTITUENTS OF VALUE.

Of these factors, the first which must be determined is the Profit Income.

This is not necessarily the full amount of profit as shown by the accounts. The latter may, for instance, have been prepared for some special purpose, such as the payment of income tax. Included in the profit shown may be certain items which may have to be eliminated before it can properly be used as the measure of goodwill. In order to distinguish the net income from the profit ordinarily shown in such accounts, the rectified amount may conveniently be described, and will be referred to in this Paper as " true profit," or the profit which remains after deducting all working expenses, including particularly:—

(a) Interest on Capital at the current investing rate. As " goodwill " represents the advantage arising from the conduct of a particular business, it must not be credited with the interest which the capital employed would produce from an ordinary investment. The capital would provide such interest without being associated with the business at all, and it is therefore only the profit in excess of such interest which has a saleable value as goodwill.

(b) There should be also an allowance for the personal services of the proprietor, the current remuneration for which could be obtained, quite independently of the business to be purchased.

The second factor is the Rate of Interest which such an income should pay on the capital invested in its purchase. The appropriate rate of interest is determined, as with other investments, by its hazard and attendant trouble. Judged by this standard, the " true profit " represents a sum of money likely to be received annually ; in other words, an annuity of which the following are the qualifications:—

It arises out of trade profits, involving the trouble of working and being subject to the fluctuations of trade conditions. Its rate per cent., therefore, must be that appropriate to trade profits in the particular business under consideration.

There may be changes in trade conditions such as are attendant upon business in general, and in particular upon the business under consideration, together with other unknown factors, such as legislation, economic developments, and changes in the habits of the community. These considerations affect the rate of interest at which the calculation is made, and are in fact implicit in all trade profits to a greater or less extent according to the class of business.

The income is not of the nature of a fixed annuity, but is based on an average of past earnings, while the looked-for benefit is in the future.

The element of certainty, therefore, is absent.

The third factor is the duration of the vendor's influence.

Of this, there is a progressive diminution, so that as years go on, this influence, which is in fact the element for which the purchaser is paying, will fade away. The annual income arising therefrom will become less year by year, and the maintenance thereof will depend upon the efforts of the purchaser. The period necessary to complete this fading out must be estimated, and will be a factor in the capitalisation in the same way as the length of a lease would be.

The element of perpetuity, therefore, is absent.

It will thus be realised that the capitalised value of the true profit, i.e., the value of the goodwill, varies according to the risks of the business which determines the appropriate rate per cent. ; and to the length of the period during which the vendor's interest may be expected to endure.

Table I. (see below) shows the calculation on a basis of 15 per cent. interest and 14 years' duration of vendor's interest.

Table II. (see previous page) summarises similar calculations for terms varying from 3 to 15 years, and at rates of interest from 10 per cent. to 20 per cent., the result showing the mathematical values of the respective profit incomes.

The rate of interest may, of course, be increased by the nature of the business and by the risks of the future, so that every case must be tried on its own merits.

In cases where goodwill comes to be valued as between partners, or for a sale to a company, wherein the services of an accountant are invoked, it is probable that calculations are made somewhat on the preceding lines. It is said, however, that in the sale and purchase of businesses generally, and particularly in the case of small businesses, the transaction is conducted on broader lines by a payment by the purchaser of a round number of years' purchase of the profits. Until a few years ago one used to hear of three years' purchase being the customary price of the ordinary trading business.

One wonders whence arose the custom of that or, indeed, any specified number of years' purchase.

It is probable that some process of calculation, as is here indicated, was adopted occasionally, and that the average result became crystallised into the " customary " number of years' purchase, which was adopted without any probing into its origin.

One finds, however, that in such cases the number of years' purchase is applied to ordinary profit and not to true profit, that is to say, that no deduction is made from the profits for personal services. It is interesting from this point of view to consider an average case:—

Take a true profit of £500 as in Table I. of 14 years' duration at 15 % interest.

The value, at the figure given, viz., 3·95 years' purchase, is £1,975.

Now work the sum in the less formal " customary " manner, writing back the amount which was deducted for personal services, in order to get at the true profit, say £3 per week or £156 per annum.

The total profit is now (£500 + £156) = £656, and the customary 3 years' purchase would give £1,968.

These results are sufficiently close to give some clue to the origin of the traditional 3 years' purchase for businesses of the ordinary calibre.

This correspondence is not only interesting in itself, but will be found to possess considerable importance in the structure of our subsequent valuation.

With these remarks we may now proceed to set out the sequence of a Specimen Valuation:—

Item 1.—Estimate the amount of the true profit.
,, 2.—Estimate the duration of vendor's influence.
,, 3.—Determine the interest appropriate to the class of business.
,, 4.—Apply the mathematical multiplier as ascertained from Table II.

At first sight these would appear to furnish in every case materials for calculating the value of goodwill. This, however, is not so ; that which they do produce is the unvarying mathematical value of an income which is certain.

Item 5.—Adjustment for Current Price.

Since the income cannot be regarded as certain, adjustment is necessary to provide for varying conditions. It will be found, for instance, that trade profits vary in the public estimation, and that although for many years in normal times business profits were held to be worth 3 years' purchase ("customary price"), there has been of later years from time to time a falling off to as low a figure as 2 or even 1½ year's purchase. This is due no doubt to the economic conditions then prevailing, and to the importation, in a rough and ready way, of an allowance for shorter duration and larger risk. At the moment there appears to be a revival of business purchase, due somewhat paradoxically to the difficulty experienced by so many in finding paid employment. Here, then, we have two multipliers, the mathematical and the customary, either of which ought, apparently, to furnish the value of the goodwill. Yet neither of them will do so by itself.

The mathematical multiplier fails because it is fixed and invariable, whereas we know that the actual sale price varies.

The customary multiplier also fails, firstly, because it contains an element of uncertainty which unfits it for accurate calculation, and, secondly, because it takes no account of the duration of the tenant's interest.

It is in the combination of the two that we find them serviceable. The mathematical multiplier gives us the value of a certain and definite income, and the "customary "price" a means of measuring the variations of public demand.

It was shown on page 114 that in an average case the mathematical multiplier of 3·95 (with an allowance for personal services) corresponds with the customary price of 3 years' purchase without such allowance.

If, therefore, we take that 3 years' purchase as a standard, and measure the variation by the rise and fall of the customary price, then in order to find the value at any given time, it will only be necessary to ascertain the current customary price, to observe the extent to which it varies from the standard, and to modify the mathematical multiplier accordingly. Thus, if it be found that the customary price has fallen below the standard 3 years' purchase to 1½ year's purchase, the mathematical multiplier should also be divided by two to allow for a similar decline in value.

Item 6.—Adjustment for Overhead Charges.

Finally, the relation of true profit to fixed overhead charges is also of importance. All the cases hitherto contemplated have been on the basis that the true profit is at least three times the amount of the rent and rates. Where the proportion is less than this, there is a decline in value, and when they are equal it is probable that the value has almost vanished. Where the profit is less than the rent and rates, the responsibility involved may make the value a minus quantity.

Table III. sets out the rate of decline due to this cause, embodying the progressive disfavour with which the purchaser regards the increasing hazard:—

APPLICATION TO THE LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT, 1927.

So far we have dealt with goodwill in general. We now come to its application to the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, under Sections 4 and 5.

Examination of the clauses in these sections shows that in its new setting the goodwill of the tenant and its valuation present two novel features.

The first is that it is not the whole of the tenant's goodwill which is to be the subject of the compensation, but only such part thereof as will adhere to the premises despite all his efforts to remove it.

The Act contemplates a tenant having arrived at the end of his lease, having created a goodwill, and being naturally desirous of retaining the benefit thereof on his removal. But this is not altogether possible. A portion of the goodwill he can carry with him by means of correspondence, circularisation and advertisement, and this may be described as "Transferable Goodwill." On the other hand, when the trader has left the premises some customers do not follow him, but transfer their custom to other traders ; this may be called "Fugitive Goodwill" and is lost altogether. But in certain cases there remains a residuum of people who still continue to deal with the old shop, and so provide an amount of readily available business for a successor. This residuum provides what is known as " Adherent Goodwill." In respect thereof a successor may be willing to pay for the premises a rent higher than could be obtained for any other purpose.

This adherent goodwill alone ranks for compensation ; great care should be taken to identify it and to estimate its extent, since the proportion of goodwill which is adherent varies largely according to the class of business. The method will be set out in the Typical Valuation, and will be found to be the same as that set out in the Specimen Valuation, with the exception that in the former the amount of the adherent profit is substituted for that of the entire profit.

The result thereof will be the capital value of the adherent goodwill.

The second new feature is that the tenant is not entitled to receive as compensation the whole of the value of the adherent profit, but only the amount by which that value exceeds the value added by causes other than goodwill.

The test imposed in Section 4 (1) (ii.) is that goodwill must be such that—

> " By reason thereof the premises could be let at a higher rent than they would have realised had no such goodwill existed."

Again, in the proviso following:—

> " The compensation shall not exceed such addition to the value of the holding as may be determined to be the direct result of the carrying on of the trade or business by the tenant."

The net result of these two provisions is that the tenant must show that the goodwill benefit exceeds that which is conferred by other causes. Now, the benefit due to other causes is reflected in the increased rent, in the difference between the rent reserved by the lease, and the rent which could be obtained in the open market for business other than that of the tenant in the case under consideration. It is not at first easy to see how a benefit arising from trade profits can be compared with one arising from increased rental value, the two things differing so widely in their nature. Happily, however, they have one point of contact, viz., their capital values, by means of which they can be mutually compared, and to this method it is essential to have recourse.

Thus, having valued the goodwill, we must now proceed to value the increased rent due to other causes, and to compare its capital value with that of the goodwill. If the latter be the greater, then the excess will be the measure of the tenant's compensation. The Typical Valuation shows the process, and comments on the details thereof will follow.

*This difference, being the excess of the Goodwill benefit over that due to Other Causes, represents the Compensation to which the tenant is entitled.

On examining this Typical Valuation, which is the form recommended to surveyors, we observe, set out therein, the whole process, consisting of two distinct items. Above the line we have the valuation of the goodwill benefit, while below the line is the comparison of the goodwill benefit, with that due to other causes. Thus, above the line we have the data upon which the valuation is founded.

On the left-hand side are the particulars relating to the case:—

1. (1) The amount of the rent is obtained from the lease, the rates being ascertained from the books.
2. (2) The amount of the market rent is a matter for estimation.
3. (3) The true profit is ascertained from the tenant's books.
4. (4) The adherent profit is a matter of estimation.
5. (5) The duration of the tenant's influence must also be gauged by the valuer. In this instance it has been taken at 14 years for reasons which will be set out in a later portion of this Paper.

On the right-hand side we have the constituent factors in the valuation of the goodwill, giving, as a result, a year's purchase of 2·17.

Below the line is the valuation itself.

In Item I. we have the amount of adherent profit	£300
This is multiplied by the years' purchase of ...	2·17
and produces a capital sum of ... ... which is the total value of the adherent profit on the basis of the lease rent, and which in the absence of any increase of rental value due to other causes would be the measure of the tenant's compensation.	£651
In this case, however, the market rent shows an increase of £50 per annum, which in Item 2 is valued for the duration of the tenant's influence, viz., 14 years on the 7 per cent. Table Y.P. 8·75 producing a capital value of	£437
Showing an excess in favour of the goodwill benefit of	£214
or an additional rental value in respect thereof, calculated at 15 per cent., of	£32 p.a.

The rate of 15 per cent. is selected as being appropriate to a rental derived from trade profits, and not arising out of the rental value of the property itself. It has much in common with the true profit, which was also taken at 15 per cent. in this instance, but the two rates need not necessarily coincide.

And now it is necessary to draw attention to a point of great importance, and that is the period for which the increased rent should be capitalised in its comparison with the goodwill benefit. It will be noticed that in the example (Typical Valuation) the term of capitalisation is taken at 14 years, a period equal to the duration of the tenant's influence.

When the Act was first passed it was considered, and still is by some, that in the expression " addition to the value " of the holding " the holding meant the freehold, and that the additional rent due to other causes should be valued in perpetuity. The question was stated thus:—

> " The tenant having added value by his goodwill, what is the value of the holding with and without the goodwill respectively?"

and it was urged that the holding meant the freehold.

The writer does not deny that the question is correctly stated, but he has been forced by experience to the conclusion that the words " the holding " do not imply perpetuity, but that the comparison of the goodwill benefit with the benefit from other causes should be upon equal terms as to time, i.e., in the present example 14 years.

This opinion is based on the following reasons:—

1. The Legal Aspect.

Nowhere in the Act is there anything defining " the " holding " as meaning freehold tenure. By Section 17 (1) the holding is defined as " any premises held under " a lease." Section 17 (2) refers to " any holding let to " a tenant."

Both these references appear to regard the word " holding " as referring to the premises and not to any form of tenure. Nothing is said as to the length of time necessary to constitute a holding ; that which appears to be contemplated by the Act is the fact of tenancy rather than its duration.

On the contrary, since goodwill by its very nature is temporary, and since goodwill is the source of additional rental value specified by the Act, it follows that the additional rent which is so contemplated is temporary in its nature.

Again, if the tenant establishes his right to a new lease in lieu of compensation, the Act fixes a maximum term of 14 years. Obviously, therefore, the Act does not regard his influence as lasting longer than 14 years.

But if the wording of the Act does not limit the meaning of the word " holding " to freehold tenure, still less is it so limited by the language of ordinary business. A tenant is said, for instance, to hold under a lease, or on a weekly tenancy or on a tenancy at will, and his " holding " is the tenancy defined as to its period by these three terms respectively.

It is urged, therefore, that neither by the requirements of the Act nor by the interpretation of ordinary phraseology, used by lawyers and laymen alike, can the idea of perpetuity be read into the definition of the expression " holding."

2. The spirit of the Act.

As we saw at the outset, the gain to the landlord is to be the measure of the tenant's compensation.

Referring to the Typical Valuation, it will be seen that the sum of £651 represents the gross value of the goodwill benefit. The landlord cannot be asked to pay the whole of this sum, because even if the goodwill did not exist, he could get from some other tenant an additional rent of £50 per annum, and the value of that additional rent must therefore be deducted before we can arrive at the net gain coming to him from goodwill. Now this goodwill benefit has been valued upon the basis of its diminishing annually until its vanishes altogether at the end of 14 years.

Surely, then, if we compare the goodwill benefit with the rent benefit for that same period of 14 years, we shall have correctly estimated the gain to the landlord.

3. The desire for general fairness towards both landlord and tenant is strongly marked throughout the Act by the conditions laid down and by the safeguards provided in the various clauses. Is it not reasonable, therefore, to conclude that any interpretation which involves a breach of that principle should be regarded as incorrect?

For that reason alone a suggestion that in any comparison one item should be valued for a limited term and the other in perpetuity should be regarded with suspicion.

Again, if the landlord were credited in the comparison with an allowance equal to the freehold value, he would not be out of pocket if the goodwill benefit of the tenant had been estimated to last in perpetuity instead of for 14 years.

And yet, when after that period the next compensation claim comes along, the landlord, having been already credited in perpetuity, is again credited with an allowance for the same section of increased rent, the latter being in this case charged up against the profits before the second tenant's goodwill value is calculated.

This overlapping of allowance for the same thing will occur as many times as claims are made by successive tenants.

The holders of the freehold theory are apprehensive that if duration be adopted as the basis of valuation, complications may arise in regard to superior landlords, who, it will be remembered, may have to reimburse the first landlord for the unexhausted value of the goodwill at the times when they come into possession. Since, however, it is only the unexhausted value in respect of which they may have to contribute, and since such unexhausted value must be proved to the satisfaction of the tribunal, there does not appear to be much in this contention.

That, in practice, the freehold theory bears very hardly on the tenant may be seen by reference to the example. The increased rent is there valued for the duration period at £437. If it were valued as freehold, it would be £714, and the tenant's compensation, instead of being £214, would be wiped out, and with it all chance of a new lease. The question as to which of the two theories, the "free-" hold" or "duration," is correct is therefore of vital importance to both landlord and tenant.

The writer considers that from every point of view a fair comparison can be made only when both goodwill benefit and that due to other causes are valued upon the common basis of the duration of the goodwill, and this procedure has been adopted in the Typical Valuation.

As to the length of the duration, this must be estimated. The adoption by the Act of 14 years as a maximum term for a new lease indicates the view of the framers of the Act, and that term may usefully be regarded as a standard for average businesses, leaving opportunity for varying the term according to the nature of the business and the circumstances of the case.

The sum of this argument is that the benefit added by the tenant should be compared with that added by other causes upon equal terms as to the duration of the benefit. Where the benefit promises to be of long standing, as in the case of improvements, the additional rent should be capitalised for an appropriately long period, possibly even in perpetuity.

Where the duration is short, as in the case of goodwill, the capitalisation should be for the same limited period. In other words, the term of capitalisation is determined, not by any possible interpretation of the word "holding," but by the duration of the benefit which the tenant bestows and by which the landlord is alleged to gain.

The foregoing pages, culminating in the Typical Example, set out the method which is held to fulfil the intention of the Act, in that it shows the additional value, if any, with which the holding is endowed by "goodwill" beyond that contributed by other causes, the essential feature being the comparison of the values contributed by "goodwill" and other causes respectively. The calculation is made on the basis of the state of things existing at the end of the lease, the rent and rates charged against profits being those then payable.

Nevertheless, an alternative method is frequently advanced by Counsel for the tenant, a method which, although fallacious, is so inviting and plausible that an examination thereof is necessary. The argument is somewhat as follows:—

> "The plaintiff shows an average annual profit of which it is estimated that a substantial portion will still adhere to the property and to the benefit of a successor.
> It is true that in the accounts there is charged only the rent reserved in the lease and the appropriate rates.
> It is true, also, that a successor will have to pay a further sum as increased rent (bringing the total to the market rental value) and that he will also have to pay additional rates; but when these deductions have been made, there still remains a balance of adherent profit, which will enure to the benefit of a successor or to the landlord. It only remains to calculate the capital value of this benefit, which, when found, will be the compensation due to the tenant."

Example :—

Thus, in the case shown in the Typical Valuation, the procedure would have been as follows:—

The adherent profit was there taken at ...		£300
From that would be deducted—
The additional rent	£50
The additional rates	25	75
Leaving a remaining profit of		£225

to which a capitalising multiplier must be applied.

But it will be seen that the rent and rates which previously amounted to £150 have now risen to £225 thus giving a proportion of one to one.

The calculation would then be—

Prop. 1 to 1 (Table III.) factor	...	·33
Value of a "good business"	...	2·61
Producing a year's purchase of	...	·87

Thus giving for the tenant's compensation (£225 × ·87) or £196.

The Typical Valuation showed £214, so that the alternative method in this instance is detrimental to the tenant.

It will be seen that this alternative method proceeds to charge the profit, not only with the rent reserved under the lease, but also with the increased rent due to other causes, so making the latter merely a part of the profit calculation. But this method is wrong for three reasons:—

First, it is wrong in principle because its use avoids the essential comparison between the additional value due to goodwill and that due to other causes.

Secondly, it confuses the issue because it is based not on the rent actually paid, nor on the conditions existing at the end of the lease, but on a higher rent and on conditions which might in other circumstances exist. That which is valued, therefore, is a different thing from that which is in question, which is the goodwill benefit at the end of the lease.

Thirdly, it frequently happens that those who put forward the alternative method do so in the hope that by so doing they may deal with the increased rent in a manner less destructive to their claim than by the comparison of capital values. Here they are, of course, mistaken, as if the increased rent be charged against profits, a degradation in value is bound to ensue.

It is useless to ignore the fact that rent and trade profits are the subject of widely different rates of capitalisation. Rent is secured on the property itself and commands an appropriately high years' purchase; trade profits are hazardous in their nature and involve the labour of conducting the business. Consequently their capital value is at best very much lower than that of rent. It is no more satisfactory to compare rent and profit on equal terms or to deduct one from the other than it would be to regard gold and lead as of equal value and to deduct one from the other. If from a mass containing both metals the gold were abstracted, the value of the remainder would be ascertained by deducting the capital value of the gold from that of the mass, and not by deducting its weight only and valuing the remainder according to its previous average. In the same way rent and profit must each be treated independently and deducted from the previous value of the combination, if the value of the remaining goodwill is to be ascertained.

Lastly, it will be found that the results produced by the alternative method differ materially from those obtained by those of the typical valuation, being sometimes less, sometimes more, and never coinciding with it except by accident. This is due to the difficulty in finding the years' purchase, which correctly represents the degradation of the goodwill value arising from the charge against profits of the additional rent and rates, in terms sufficiently accurate to enable us to dispense with the comparison of capital values. The use of Table III. will do something in this direction, but it is not entirely suitable for the purpose. Table III. purports to estimate the allowance which a purchaser would make in his price in respect of the increased proportion of rent and rates to profit. Hence it contains a psychological element which fits it for use in a valuation but not for a calculation which is strictly mathematical. The psychological process of valuation is completed when we arrive at the goodwill value at the end of the lease. What is then required is the purely arithmetical process of comparing ascertained values. Table III. will not, therefore, afford to the alternative method the correct modification of years' purchase. Indeed, the achievement of anything like accuracy in this direction would require a calculation so complicated as to be unsuitable for general use. The surveyor is therefore recommended to adhere to the simple and correct method of the Typical Valuation. Before closing his calculation, however, the surveyor should note that the figure he has arrived at may be still further modified by conditions set out in the proviso to Section 4. These conditions should be carefully studied, as although they are not actually concerned with the process of valuation, they may affect vitally the validity of the claim and the way in which it will be regarded by the Tribunal.

NEW LEASE.

Having by this means arrived at the amount, if any, of the compensation due to the tenant, another stage of the Act comes into operation. By Section 5 the tenant is permitted under certain conditions to claim a new lease. The fundamental condition of this privilege is that the tenant must be able to show that he is entitled to compensation. Consequently, although it may be a new lease which is desired by the tenant, and not compensation, his right to the latter must be proved precisely as if it were the object of his claim ; all that has been said, therefore, becomes germane to the tenant's efforts towards obtaining an extension of his holding.

The section sets out the conditions with which the tenant must comply and the nature of the defence which the landlord may set up against his claim. The majority of these conditions come within the province of the legal adviser, but the item of compensation is still a matter for the estimation of the surveyor.

In this respect special attention is invited to the wording of Section V. (1):—

> " Where the tenant alleges that though he would be entitled to compensation . . . the sum which could be > awarded to him . . . would not compensate him for the loss of goodwill he will suffer if he removed to and carried on his business in other premises, he may in lieu of claiming such compensation . . . . serve on the landlord notice requiring a new lease of the premises . . . .''

This does not mean that the tenant may claim compensation or alternatively a new lease if the amount awarded to him is not sufficient. It implies that he must forecast the result of his claim before the tribunal, firstly, as to his right to compensation, and, secondly, as to its amount, and upon the correctness of this forecast the result of his claim will depend. If anything further be needed to show how essential is the accurate determination of the compensation due to the tenant it would be supplied by the necessity of this forecast.

The work of the surveyor in this respect is all important. Whether the methods outlined in these pages be adopted by him, or whether he employ others better suited to the particular case, the fact will remain that upon him rests largely the responsibility for the successful conduct of cases under the Landlord and Tenant Act.

At the outset his advice is required as to whether the tenant has a claim, and, if so, as to the compensation to which he is entitled. By his help, therefore, while unfounded claims will be avoided, many tenants will be able to take advantage of the benefits conferred by the Act, and by his skilled evidence the surveyor should be able to render great assistance to the tribunal.

Thus, upon the soundness of his judgment and the accuracy of his estimates depend not only the interests of his clients but the very fabric of this Act, built up by Parliament, after years of preparation, with the sole object of adjusting fairly the important but delicate relations between landlord and tenant.

The Chartered Surveyors' Institution

AT THE ORDINARY GENERAL MEETING

Held at The Chartered Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 5th February, 1934.

MR. PERCIVAL F. TUCKETT (President) in the Chair.

A DISCUSSION took place on Mr. J. G. HEAD'S Paper entitled

GOODWILL :

Introductory Remarks by Mr. Head.

On receiving the Council's invitation to give a Paper on the practical working of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, it seemed to me that the word "practical" should be interpreted as meaning that aspect of the subject which the surveyor would encounter when putting into practice, on behalf of his client, the provisions of the Act ; in other words, that the Paper should concentrate upon those points which relate to the surveyor's practice as distinct from that of the lawyer.

Any attempt to deal with the legal aspect would involve the production, not of a Paper but of a volume, and would be entirely beyond the limits of practicability. It has been assumed, therefore, that all questions of law have been properly settled under the guidance of legal advisers, and that upon the advice so given the rights and liabilities of their respective clients are to be reduced to figures by the surveyors. Nor is there lacking ample justification for such a limitation of our enquiry. The problems attending the estimation of values alone will occupy all, and more than all, the time at our disposal, since the path along which we follow the Act is not too well lighted, and until recently was quite untrodden.

We are met at the outset by a shadowy and elusive shape entitled "Goodwill"; an important entity which is referred to in the Act as one of its principal components; yet it is not only undefined but varies both in form and degree, according to the context of the section in which it appears. For instance—

Where in Section 4 a goodwill is mentioned, by which the rental value is increased, it is obviously that goodwill which cleaves to the premises after the tenant has gone, i.e., the adherent goodwill.

Where, as in Section 5, the tenant has the right to claim a new lease if the compensation he could recover would not compensate him for the loss of goodwill which he would suffer if he removed, the reference is to a goodwill embracing something which is additional to that which would adhere to the old premises; something which would not be capable of transference to the new, in other words—fugitive goodwill.

And thirdly, where as in the proviso to Section 4 (e) there is reference to goodwill which may have been created or increased by restrictions imposed by the landlord, the word "goodwill" clearly refers to the entire goodwill of the business.

Obviously, therefore, the surveyor must be prepared to analyse and identify the particular class of goodwill before proceeding to make his valuation.

The Paper which has been submitted is an attempt to provide a basis on which to calculate this value, under the conditions contemplated by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927.

The subject divides itself into two main sections:—

I.—The principle upon which should be estimated the value added to the holding as the direct result of goodwill, i.e., beyond that which is contributed by causes other than goodwill.

(a) It is suggested that the proper method is by comparison of the total benefit due to goodwill with that due to other causes. The excess of the former, if any, to represent the value added by goodwill to the holding.

(b) It is further suggested that in such comparison the capitalisation of the additional rent due to other causes should be based on the duration of the tenant's influence and not on perpetuity.

II.—The second section deals with the details of the valuation.

Here there are four main points which must be taken into consideration:—

Table II.	(a) Duration of tenant's influence ; (b) Rate of interest appropriate to class of business ;
	(c) Current variation of price ;
Table III.	(d) Proportion of profit to rent and rates.

These are points of pure valuation and as such appeal principally to surveyors. Provided, however, they all receive due consideration, some variation may be allowed in their application.

It is not intended in any way to set up a hard-and-fast method, but rather to discover and tabulate the main principles which underlie a calculation of this kind, leaving room for modifications which may be required in individual cases.

Indeed, it may be said that every case must be dealt with on its own merits and in the light of its own conditions.

All that is claimed is that the Paper provides a reasonable way of dealing with the average case, and that the steps which go to make up the somewhat ponderous procedure are founded upon essential principles, and that they provide an opportunity of making the alteration required by the special conditions which may attend any specified case.

For instance, there is the important question of the duration of the tenant's influence. This factor modifies definitely the value of the goodwill. One can well imagine a business of which the nature, as well as the method of its conduct, is such that the tenant's influence, instead of lasting fourteen years, as assumed in our Typical Valuation, might die out in a much shorter time, say seven years. If this were the case, the first item in the Valuation, i.e., the mathematical multiplier, would at once be reduced from 3·95 to 3·4 with a corresponding diminution of the eventual years' purchase. A similar result would occur if the trade were of so hazardous a nature as to require the application of a higher rate of interest.

On the other hand the tenant's influence may for various reasons be of a more lasting nature, and consequently be deserving of a higher years' purchase. Such an increase of value might arise from some statute or agreement which would endow the undertaking with a right to continue, and possibly with some measure of protection from competition. An instance of such a state of things is shown in the prices paid recently for the acquisition of certain omnibus concerns, where five years' purchase of the net average profit was paid in some cases, and in others was refused.

There are, of course, other characteristics of a business which may affect its value, such as the amount of stock necessary for carrying on the trade. For example, it is obvious that the money locked up in stock in a milk business is much less than that which would be required for a draper's, with the result that the net profits of the former would command a higher years' purchase than the latter. All these things are capable of adjustment by the method proposed.

The fundamental principle upon which the method is based is that the valuation of the goodwill depends on the profits earned. Although this is a sound principle in the majority of cases, it does not necessarily mean that where there is little or no profit there is no goodwill. On the contrary it is conceivable that although in certain instances the profits might be very small owing to bad trade conditions, they would revive with normal trade recovery. In such a case it might be fairly claimed that a goodwill value exists.

Again, with a newly established business the early years are often lean as to profits—indeed, there may be actual loss; yet it is possible that a part of the loss ought to be regarded as capital sunk in the creation of the business, which at the time of valuation may be established and in a condition to earn normal profits.

Although admitting these possibilities, the writer urges that their occurrence would be exceptional, and that while the suggested method provides adequately for average cases, the exceptions can also be dealt with by making suitable modifications or allowances at one stage or other of the process.

It is not suggested that in buying the goodwill of a business by negotiation the purchaser would necessarily go through the calculation indicated in this Paper. He would probably do nothing of the kind. He would be informed of the amount of the profits and would make his own mental estimate of their value to him. The process, as far as the ordinary purchaser is concerned, is psychological in its nature. This psychological element is largely increased in the case of the purchaser contemplated by the Landlord and Tenant Act. Here the hypothetical purchaser has no knowledge of the profits of the business carried on at the premises he is assumed to desire. He has to form his own estimate, not only of the profits, but also of the proportion of such profits which would adhere to the premises, in spite of the utmost efforts of the outgoing tenant to remove them. In addition to this the purchaser has to form his own idea of the capital value to him of the somewhat shadowy figure at which he has arrived.

It is no exaggeration to say that the estimation of value by the hypothetical successor under the Act is a purely psychological process. The difficulty of translating the psychological into the practical is obvious, but fortunately the provision by the Act of a Tribunal to decide the difference in question between the landlord and tenant affords a solution of the difficulty. When the matter comes before the referee, the question resolves itself into "What ought the successor to pay?" and at once becomes amenable to evidence, which should disclose many factors which were previously absent.

This Paper, therefore, is merely an attempt to record those steps which a surveyor's mind must traverse in his endeavour to transform a psychological valuation into a practical one.

Yet, after all, that is no more nor less than is done in every valuation. Value is in its essence a psychological phenomenon and must be estimated as such. When this has been settled in the mind of the valuer, then, and not until then, is it expressed in terms of money by means of the Valuation Tables. The process indicated in the Paper therefore possesses in its psychological factor no greater element of uncertainty than is present in property valuations of the most ordinary description.

Again, if it be urged that those whose business it is to dispose of trade goodwill employ no such method as is here indicated, but that they merely adopt one figure of years' purchase for the profit they have to sell, without going through the progression suggested, it may be pointed out that their object is by no means the same as that of the surveyor to whom the Paper is addressed.

The object of the vendor's agent is to get the best possible price for his client, and although in so doing he must directly or indirectly consider the various points we have referred to, he may take them into consideration in a general fashion only and so arrive at once at a single figure of years' purchase.

The object of the referee, on the other hand, is to do the fair thing between the parties ; consequently, he must consider the various steps and give to every one its due significance, somewhat in the fashion suggested. Similarly, as the surveyor is concerned with presenting his client's case to the referee in a convincing manner, it is requisite that he should follow the same sequence of thought as the Tribunal itself must traverse.

The main duty of the surveyor in the application of the Act is to determine the addition to the value of the holding which is the direct result of goodwill attaching to the premises. The method adopted in the Paper is to estimate the capital equivalents, first of the benefit conferred by the adherent goodwill, and secondly that conferred by causes other than goodwill. These two amounts are compared, and if the former is in excess, the difference represents the additional value due exclusively to the attached—or adherent goodwill.

The Paper explains why this method of comparison is considered by the writer as the best and, indeed, the only reliable method of estimating the extent of the benefit which is the direct result of the goodwill. Indeed, a further advantage is found in the fact that it affords a means of eliminating that portion of the added value which is due exclusively to the position of the premises as provided in the proviso to Section IV. (d) (ii.). The market rent includes the additional value due to causes other than goodwill, and therefore includes that due to position. Hence the method of comparison fulfils the otherwise difficult task of segregating the positional value and no further deduction on that account is necessary.

Finally, the most controversial part of the Paper is that which suggests that in capitalising the additional rental value arising from causes other than goodwill the multiplier should be that appropriate to the estimated duration of the tenant's influence, and not that applicable to perpetuity, as was originally held. The legal interpretation of the word "holding" being involved in this suggestion, the writer, as a layman, puts forward his suggestion with humility, upon the ground that in his experience justice is not otherwise done between the landlord and tenant, nor the obvious intention of the Act in that regard properly fulfilled.

These are some of the directions in which the Paper appears to require general comment, but doubtless to those who have perused it many other criticisms will occur. To these the writer will reply as best he is able, but in any case his sincere thanks are offered to all those who have paid him the compliment of studying the points raised therein.

Mr. C. Herbert Bedells (Past-President) in proposing the vote of thanks paid a personal tribute to his old friend Mr. Head, and his high appreciation of the Paper. He had been a little disappointed that the Paper did not deal with the subjects of improvements, new leases, modifications of the effects of covenants, and so on, as well as with the subject of goodwill. Mr. Head, however, had already answered that point by saying that he had found even the limited treatment which he had had time to give on the one point dealt with was so lengthy that to have dealt with others would have meant a volume.

He also regretted that Mr. Head had omitted reference to the cases which had been brought before arbitrators generally under the Act. Mr. Head had had access in an exceptional degree to such information which would have formed the basis of a contribution of great value. As Mr. Head had not given such particulars, he ventured to put forward the suggestion that one of the younger members of The Institution should take the trouble to collate, as far as possible, references to reported case already heard under the Act.

In Mr. Head's exhaustive treatment of goodwill he had next to nothing to say about the difficult question of the estimation of goodwill alleged to have been created by a lessee who had received already what he would call a compulsory lease during the period of the extended term.

In cases where a lessee put up a claim to compensation, not with the idea that he was going to get compensation, but to get a new lease, quantum was not so important, because when he had established the fact that compensation was claimable by him, he immediately, and almost automatically, proceeded to prove that that compensation would be inadequate to recompense him for the loss of the particular kind of goodwill which had been referred to, by Lord Justice Scrutton if he remembered rightly, as being something like equivalent to the man's business rather than his goodwill under the Act. When that had been established, quantum—the actual value from goodwill attributable to the premises—was not a matter of importance ; but quantum was everything when one was considering a claim for goodwill alleged to have been created during the period of a further lease, because if it was established it had to be paid in cash. That was a point in regard to which he wanted to make clear his difficulty. If the basis of the value of goodwill was that of a steadily diminishing factor, then even if the business showed no increase at the end of the term as compared with its value at the beginning, had not the lessee pari passu with the assumed diminishing value of the goodwill at the commencement of the term been automatically " creating " goodwill of his own for which he could claim compensation in so far as it would be reflected in addition to the rental value which would be enjoyed by the lessor in reversion? That, of course, was not the view usually taken, which was rather represented by the suggestion which Mr. Foa made in his memorandum, namely, that such created goodwill would be represented rather by, let him say, the addition of a department to a large store ; that was to say, an entirely new subject-matter on which goodwill could arise. He would be very glad if Mr. Head would throw some additional light on the question of the valuation of goodwill so arising.

Mr. A. J. BRICKWELL (Member of Council), in seconding the vote of thanks, took the opportunity of saying how pleased the members were to see their old friend Mr. Head present once again. After reading the Paper twice he had come to the conclusion that it could be described as erudite, instructive and, what was more important to those present, helpful.

He particularly commended to the members the paragraphs as to transferable, fugitive and adherent values of goodwill, and those very interesting Tables I., II. and III., the adjustment of value of profits in proportion to fixed overheads.

As regards the specimen valuation of goodwill and the typical valuation of the value of adherent goodwill, he ventured to think that Mr. Head had been very frank as a professional man, and had given what some lecturers before The Institution carefully withheld.

As he understood that there were several distinguished visitors who were to follow him in the discussion, he would content himself by seconding the vote of thanks to Mr. Head for his Paper, which, in his humble judgment, was one of the most valuable The Institution had had.

Mr. EDGAR FOA (Barrister-at-Law) (Visitor) said that it seemed to him, as a lawyer, that it was difficult to understand how Mr. Head could be wrong on what he thought he termed his main point. He had before him a copy of the Act, and the words were " The sum to be awarded as compensation for good- " will in Section 4 shall not exceed such addition to the value " of the holding at the termination of the tenancy." The whole question was what that word " holding " meant. Here the draughtsman of the Act was dealing with a compensation to be awarded. To be awarded against whom? The person who had got the holding. A holding was of different value according to the interest which a man had in it. The holding of a freeholder was of greater interest in most cases than the holding of a mere leaseholder ; and when a section of an Act was dealing with the compensation to be paid by a person, and spoke of the holding, it referred to the interest of that person in the holding.

The Act itself did not help. It contained no definition of the word " holding " at all, but in Section 17 there was a description of what holdings were. That description was one not of time but of place. That was obvious from Section 17 which said: "The holdings to which this Act applies are any premises "held under a lease, other than a mining lease . . . . not being "agricultural holdings within the meaning of the Agricultural "Holdings Act." Therefore it was clear that Section 17 did not help in the least in determining the provision in Section 4 where holdings were spoken of, and where he thought it must be clear from the text that the holdings referred to were the holdings of the person by whom the compensation given by that section was directed to be paid.

That was the reason why he had always thought that the views which he had just mentioned were the right ones, and he would go away from the meeting more than ever convinced that he was right. Mr. Head had mentioned that point as being the principal one which he intended his Paper to cover. It was a very important point, and subject to anything which might fall from subsequent speakers, it seemed beyond any reasonable doubt that Mr. Head's view was correct.

He was sure those present must have had a good many cases about Section 5, the right to claim a new lease. That was a most obscure section. Goodwill was of three different kinds. They were easily memorised by referring to the animal world. The dog, as a rule, followed his master. The cat, on the other hand, remained in the house even if there was a change of masters. The rat, if it was in a ship which it thought was going to sink, deserted it. One had accordingly what was called a "dog" goodwill, a "cat" goodwill, and a "rat" goodwill. The rat goodwill disappeared; it was the fugitive goodwill to which Mr. Head referred. The dog goodwill was that which the old tenant took with him to another place; it followed him, and the Act had nothing whatever to do with the dog goodwill. The only thing the Act dealt with was the cat goodwill—the goodwill attached, like the cat, to the premises. And now it was at present settled, according to the decisions, that the tenant was not entitled to anything except what attached to the premises and from which the landlord got some benefit.

Looking at Section 5, the draughtsman, as it would appear, did not exactly appreciate what he had been saying, because after dealing with Section 4, with the general scheme of compensation for goodwill, he went on to say (in colloquial language) "So "much for compensation, but there are some cases where com-"pensation is not enough for you, and you ought to have a new "lease altogether." What were those cases? One would think that one would find something exceptional, something more in favour of the tenant than he could avail himself of in Section 4. Section 5 reads: "Where the tenant alleges that, though he "would be entitled to compensation under the last foregoing "section, the sum which could be awarded to him under that "section would not compensate him for the loss of goodwill . . . ." It would appear that that condition, so far from being anything extra which was not included in Section 4, was a condition which must be fulfilled in every case, because of the compensation that he got which he was only entitled to under the Act. He was only entitled to "cat" compensation, and only a portion of that. Therefore in every case it seemed to him (Mr. Foa) that so far from Section 5 giving an opening to the tenant in an exceptional case, it said that Section 5 was to apply in every case in which he was entitled to compensation under Section 4 where the conditions were fulfilled.

The present was a good opportunity to state that he had discovered a rather bad mistake in his Memorandum on the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. It occurred on page 58. There was a note there which was wrong. It was the definition clause, Section 25: "The expression 'landlord' means any person who "under a lease is, as between himself and the tenant or other "lessee, for the time being entitled to the rents and profits of "the demised premises payable under the lease." He had put in an unfortunate note on page 58 to the effect: "The definitions "of 'tenant' and 'landlord' are in effect the same as those in "Section 57 of the Agricultural Holdings Act"—they were not— "and the difficulties which have been experienced in ascertaining "who, as being entitled for the time being to the rents and "profits, is 'landlord' within the latter Act will very likely, in "the case of the sale of a reversion, be also met with under this "Act." He was sorry to say that he had foolishly left out of view the fact that they had dealt with that very point in those words "as between himself and the tenant or other lessee for the "time being entitled to," and that those words were not in the Agricultural Holdings Act. That was a bad mistake. Boswell used to tell the story of a lady who reproached Dr. Johnson with having wrongly defined the word "pastern" in his dictionary. She asked him how he could possibly have come to define "pastern" as the knee of a horse, and his answer was "Ignorance, madam. Pure ignorance," and that was his own answer. And as he (Mr. Foa) feared, he must plead guilty to a little carelessness as well.

Mr. S. P. J. Merlin (Barrister-at-Law) (Visitor) said that Mr. Horton-Smith and he felt it an honour to have been invited to attend the meeting that evening in their representative capacities, as he understood, of Chairman and Secretary respectively of the Referees' Association. It was because of the desire of that Association, as an Association and as a body of referees, to see that the Landlord and Tenant Act of 1927 was harmoniously and uniformly worked throughout the country, that he had come to the meeting to help, if he could, in the discussion on Mr. Head's really excellent Paper.

When the Act was passed, 57 referees were appointed. About 20 of them were surveyors, about 20 of them were solicitors, and the rest were members of the Bar. Of those 57 referees, Mr. Head was the only one who had made a really serious attempt to deal with the quantification of goodwill, which was the concept of Section 4 of the Act, in a scientific manner. The Association of Referees, as he had said, desired to see justice done, and they were most grateful to Mr. Head for the way in which he had continuously assisted referees to arrive at a proper quantification of goodwill. It was easy for surveyors to deal with the commercial value of goodwill in the case of a willing seller and a willing buyer, but that was not the concept under Section 4 at all.

He would take the case of a grocer in a county or market town such as Bedford or Chelmsford or Winchester who had a twenty-one years' lease and who had made an average net profit of £1,000 a year during that period. He would suppose that the landlord wanted possession of the premises at the end of the lease so that the tenant could not get a new lease. It was an absolute defence, under Section 5, to a claim for a new lease that the landlord required the premises for his own possession or for the possession of a son or daughter over eighteen years of age. The tenant was then relegated to an alternative claim to monetary compensation under Section 4, and if he could establish that claim, he would get cash as a sop in lieu of a new lease. The tenant had to go out; he would assume that the tenant had carried on business in, say, High Street, Bedford, and when he had to move had found suitable alternative accommodation in, say, Commercial Street, a quarter or half a mile away. He was going into suitable alternative premises, and was going to carry on his business as a grocer there as before, and as well as he could. How was one going to quantify his goodwill under Section 4 within the meaning of the Act? What was the usual experience of surveyors as to what happened when a man moved from one part of a town to another and took away as much as he could of the goodwill that he had in his old shop? In practice and in real life he thought it would be found that about one-third of the man's customers followed him; it all depended on the personality and the capital and the ability of each respective tenant and each respective successor in the old shop; all those would be out to fight for the goodwill. He would assume that everything was on a par with regard to the old occupier and the new occupier, his successor. The old occupier would take to his new shop possibly one-third of his customers ; that was the " dog " goodwill. One-third of the customers would possibly stay behind at the old shop ; that was the " cat " goodwill. One-third possibly would not like to follow the shopkeeper to his new premises, and possibly did not care for his successor, for some reason or other, with the result that they went to rival grocers in Bedford ; that was the fugitive or the " rat " goodwill. It was the " rat " goodwill which, if it existed, entitled a man to a new lease in lieu of compensation, as Mr. Foa had just pointed out, under Section 4. Suppose the grocer made £1,000 a year in his old premises, and two years' purchase was taken as the value of the commercial goodwill, the totality of his goodwill would be £2,000. One-third of that went perchance with the grocer to his new premises, one-third remained behind, and one-third was lost to both the landlord and the tenant, so that £666, being one-third of the £2,000, would be the " cat " goodwill adhering to the old premises. That was the sum which a tenant was entitled to under Section 4, but there was one thing he wanted to point out in that connection.

He would ask Mr. Head to tell him if he was wrong in the criticism he was going to make of the Typical Valuation, which was really the pith of the Paper. There was one cardinal factor in that typical valuation which he would like to consider further before he could accept it as a guide for universal application, that was, the item termed " Benefit due to Other Causes," the most common example being the one given by Mr. Head, namely, the difference between lease rent and market rent, which difference was given as £50 per annum in the example. The rental equivalent was now £121 instead of £32, but that did not make any difference, and he would adhere to the original figures. The quantum of the figures did not make any difference to his criticism. Mr. Head had multiplied the difference of £50 by 8·75, which came to £437. The adherent goodwill of £300 (being one-third of the annual net profit of £900) Mr. Head had multiplied by 2·17 only, making £651. Deducting £437 from £651, there was left £214, which at 15 per cent. gave only £32 per annum of increased rental value due to the tenant's adherent goodwill.

His first comment on that was that, if the increase due to other causes had been £100 instead of £50, the tenant's goodwill would have been a minus quantity, and in the typical valuation the tenant would then have lost his case instead of winning it. It did not seem to him right to base the adherent goodwill solely on the comparative values of (1) the increased rental value due to adherent goodwill, and (2) the increased rental value due to other causes, and to capitalise them with such different multipliers as 2 and 8.

The only thing to which Section 4 of the Act had regard was the adherent goodwill or attached goodwill which had " become " attached to the premises and by reason whereof the premises " could be let at a higher rent than they would have realised " had no such goodwill attached thereto." Those were the last words of Section 4 (1).

He did not see anything in the Act, express or implied, requiring the increased rental value (due to the tenant's goodwill) to be compared with the increased rental value due to other causes. To his mind they had very little relativity indeed. Especially did it seem wrong to him to multiply the tenant's goodwill by 2·17 and the benefit due to other causes by 8·75, and thereby, in many deserving cases, wipe out entirely the tenant's increase, which, to his mind, should stand intact and not be subjected to such a comparison or consequential deduction.

He would take, for example, the following case, and see how the method would work out. Suppose a tenant in 1920 took a grocer's shop at Dagenham on a fourteen years' lease at £100 per annum, and that that rental was then a fair market rental. He thought his choice of the locus Dagenham would take the minds of the members in advance to the point that he was going to make. He would suppose further the following facts. Every word had to be weighed. (1) That Dagenham had by 1934 increased in population from 5,000 to 50,000 ; (2) That the shop in question was in one of the best plum positions in Dagenham as it had developed and grown to in 1934 ; (3) That the true market rental of the shop (due to other causes than the goodwill attached by the tenant) in 1934 was £500 ; (4) That the net profits of the said tenant amunted to £1,500 in 1934, and had progressed from £500 in 1920 to £1,500 in 1934, during the period of fourteen years, and averaged £900 per annum, so making an adherent profit of £300 for the attached goodwill.

Another grocer, desirous of securing the goodwill of the tenant, would undoubtedly pay the landlord not only £500, the true market rental of the premises, but also another £50 or £100 further rental in order to secure the attached goodwill. If (as in the typical valuation) the adherent profit of £300 was multiplied by 2·17, it came to £651. Then if the increase in market rent due to other causes, which was £400, was multiplied by 8·75, the result was £3,500. If the £3,500 was deducted from £651, a minus quantity of £2,849 was the result, and the tenant got nothing for his admitted goodwill and adherent profit handed over to his successor.

He would give another example. He would suppose there were two grocers in the same street, with similar shops, in the same town in the year 1900. One had a fifteen years' lease at £100 per annum, and the other had a thirty years' lease at £100 per annum, all the factors being the same when they started. In 1915 the first tenant's lease expired and he got another fifteen years' lease at £200 per annum instead of £100 per annum, on account of the general increase in rental values due to " other " causes." In 1930 the two leases synchronised in their expiration. Both tenants were making the same net profit of £2,000 per annum in their businesses. He was assuming twin businesses in every respect. In 1930 the true market rental of both shops had, he would assume, increased to £300 per annum. That would be a 50 per cent. increase on the second fifteen years' lease, and 200 per cent. increase on the thirty years' lease. Applying the typical valuation to those two cases, there would be no goodwill value adherent to the thirty years' leaseholder at all, but there would to the fifteen years' leaseholder. Yet they were absolutely twin businesses in every respect. Anyone going into them as purchasers for the value of the goodwill would get exactly the same thing, but if the typical valuation was applied to them, totally different results would be obtained.

It might be that he was making a mistake ; it was for Mr. Head and the members to decide. The Paper was, he understood, to be circulated to the Referee's Association, and he would like Mr. Head, with his mathematical knowledge and his experience in tabulating, to go into the question before that was done, so that a mistake would not be broadcast. The point had been acted upon, to his personal knowledge, in some cases in which he had been engaged. Goodwill was a very peculiar thing ; it was a concept which had all kinds of angles and aspects and characters.

Mr. H. ARTHUR STEWARD (Hon. Secretary) said he agreed that it was most necessary to keep in mind the strict purpose of the Act in so far as it related to the question of goodwill.

The primary intention of the Legislature surely had been to prevent an unscrupulous landlord from bleeding a tenant who had built up a business and who could not afford to leave his pitch. The landlord, if he so wished, could blackmail the tenant into paying a much higher rent than the market value rather than risk losing some of his business by having to start again elsewhere. If that was a correct interpretation of its purpose, he thought few would quarrel with it. In effect it was that the landlord should compensate the tenant to the extent which he was bleeding him. That seemed to be the view of the writer of the Paper, as he said that, in his view, the purpose might be summarised as being "That the tenant shall be recompensed—

"not for what he loses—but for what the landlord will gain."
Personally he was very pleased to see that statement, because that was what he himself had always understood the purpose to be.

Mr. Head made an interesting and significant remark under the heading "The Spirit of the Act," where he said "As we "saw at the outset, the gain to the landlord is to be the measure
"of the tenant's compensation." He did wish that Mr. Head had found space to deal with what would happen in practice, and the cases where cash actually passed from landlord to tenant in respect of goodwill. He was assuming that Mr. Head considered there must be a definite practical or cash gain to the landlord, and not merely a hypothetical one. Personally he could only think of one set of circumstances under which a landlord could obtain a practical gain as a result of his tenant's goodwill. Assume Smith had carried on the business of a butcher for many years in a certain shop; his lease came to an end, and his landlord said "I want £150 per annum before I grant a "new lease to Smith. I know the market value is only £100
"per annum for any other business except a butcher, but if
"Smith will not pay £150 per annum, I know that Jones, who "is also a butcher, would be quite willing to do so, because of
"the goodwill which Smith has built up." That was a clear case for compensation for goodwill because there was practical gain to the landlord.

But suppose the landlord said "I don't want a butcher's
"business here any longer, and I would sooner take £100 per "annum from a jeweller or some other business." Smith lost his goodwill, but there was no gain to the landlord. Or assume that the lease of the adjoining shop fell in at the same time, and that was used for a business which had nothing to do with the trade of a butcher, but the tenant was particularly anxious to enlarge his premises, and in consequence was willing to pay £200 per annum for a lease. The butcher lost his goodwill, but there was no gain therefrom to the landlord.

It would be remembered that the proviso to Section 4 (1) (a) said "The Tribunal in awarding compensation shall have regard "to the effect of change of user on the value of the goodwill to
"the landlord." It would be noticed that the word is "shall," not "may."

If he was wrong in those contentions, and that a tenant was entitled to compensation for goodwill, even though it was only hypothetical so far as the landlord was concerned, what about his friend Smith, the butcher, whose lease came to an end, and the landlord decided to rebuild the property; not for the purpose of a butcher's shop, but for a general redevelopment in his idea of good estate management? The landlord might get more, or less, for the bare site than the market value of the old shop. That might be immaterial, but in any event he would gain nothing from the butcher's goodwill.

It was quite clear under Section 5 (3) (b) that a tenant could not demand a new lease if the premises were to be pulled down, but it did not specifically say that he was to be debarred from compensation, though it was implied by Section 4 (1) (a), already referred to, namely, that the Tribunal should have regard to the value of the goodwill to the landlord.

If, on the other hand, he (Mr. Steward) was wrong, and the measure of compensation was to be hypothetical gain to the landlord, it followed that no business premises could be pulled down and redeveloped (because every owner of a business must have some goodwill) except on payment by the landlord to the tenant of "blood money" in order to enable him to redevelop his property as he thought best; and personally he did not believe, to use Mr. Head's words, that was the correct interpretation of the purpose of the Act. If that were so, the statement in the early part of Mr. Head's Paper as his view of the purpose of the Act, namely, "That the tenant shall be recompensed not for "what he loses, but for what the landlord will gain," was, he ventured to say, wrong, and should read "the tenant shall be "recompensed not for what the landlord will gain, but for what "he (the tenant) loses." If, however, the compensation to the tenant had to be the actual cash gain to the landlord, then they came back to what he had suggested were the only set of circumstances where cash would actually pass from the landlord to the tenant, in his case of Mr. Smith, the butcher, being pushed out of his shop because Mr. Jones, another butcher, was prepared to pay more rent. A case which he thought was exceedingly rare.

If he was correct, then the conclusion of the whole matter was that those sections of the Act were mostly moonshine or dust thrown in the eyes of tenants who thought they were going to receive something, but in actual practice, except under exceptional circumstances, would get nothing, and which personally he had always thought to be the case.

Sir HARRISS FIRTH (Chartered Surveyor) said that the conclusion that leapt to one's mind on a first perusal of the Paper was that a problem of two primary factors only arose, (1) to ascertain the adherent true profit, and (2) to find the appropriate years' purchase to apply to such a profit. But when one dug more deeply into the problem, as Mr. Head had done, one found that there was a wealth of other matter to be explored before a satisfactory solution to the problem could be sighted. The solution, he suggested, was to be found only by an attempt to grasp what goodwill, in its nature and its incidence, really was.

There was no definition in the Act of the goodwill for which it provided compensation, but he thought there might be general acceptance of a valuer's interpretation of Section 4 on some such lines as the following: (a) Adherent goodwill alone could rank for compensation, and (b) that part only of adherent goodwill which exceeded market rental value for any business other than that of the quitting tenant (subject to the conditions of proviso (a)) could be the subject of compensation.

Statutory goodwill, as he would call it, was a new thing altogether. It differed in nature from the goodwill as hitherto ordinarily assessed on sale and purchase in that it was wholly adherent to the premises, and for that reason it would require different methods and principles for its assessment.

The kernel of the treatise was to be found in the two constituents of value referred to as (1) "adherent profit," and (2) "the duration of the vendor's influence," and it was the adoption of the latter factor which prescribed the mode of assessment advocated by Mr. Head.

If he had rightly interpreted the method it was as follows: Capitalise the adherent profit by a years' purchase related to the duration of the tenant's influence ; from it deduct the capitalised excess (if any) of market over leased rent at the termination of the tenancy ; and the remainder is the compensation payable to the tenant on quitting the holding. The calculation involved such controversial factors as the adherent proportion of profit, the duration of the tenant's influence, the appropriate interest, and a possible adjustment for the current market price of goodwill of similar trades or businesses, admittedly a wide and fruitful field for disputation, to be avoided if any less contentious method could be devised to give a proper result.

Why did Mr. Head adopt the two factors he had mentioned as the basis of his method of assessing adherent goodwill, instead of finding that goodwill in terms of the "higher rent" referred to in Section 4 (1)? The reason would be found under the heading of "Duration of the Vendor's Influence." It was because in Mr. Head's opinion the vendor's influence progressively diminished to vanishing point, and by inference it might be assumed that the adherent profit, but for the efforts of the purchaser in its maintenance, would fade entirely away within the same period.

He was in agreement with the view that purchased goodwill gave way in time to the goodwill of the successor in those cases where commercial goodwill did not ordinarily attach to particular premises, i.e., where special qualifications, as distinguished from ordinary business aptitude, were the foundation of an established connection.

The maintenance of the connection in such cases was obviously dependent upon the equally proficient qualifications of the purchaser of the goodwill, and it stood to reason that the skill of the creator of the business would rapidly merge into the skill of the successor. The diminution factor applied to the vendor's influence in such a case should be very strong indeed, but it was doubtful that such goodwill, being so largely personal, ever attached to particular premises.

He found great difficulty, however, in accepting the diminution factor as appropriate to the assessment of compensation for adherent goodwill in the class of case which one visualised as falling within the provisions of Section 4. He would expect to find that the majority of the claims for goodwill compensation would arise out of established connections in the retail trade or business, which needed for their successful maintenance little more than ordinary business aptitude sufficient to ensure good management. He referred to retail businesses particularly because it was common knowledge that the goodwill of manufacturing businesses clung very lightly to particular premises.

Adherent goodwill, as its name implied, was a thing the quitting tenant could not take away. It confounded the issue to think in terms of a goodwill created by the tenant, since goodwill was largely created and maintained by the community, and, whilst it might fluctuate under varying trade conditions, it would not diminish below the law of averages, granted ordinary business aptitude on the part of the new tenant.

Who could say that an average business aptitude exercised by a quitting tenant in the management of any retail business could influence its customers for the succeeding fourteen years or even fourteen months? And who could discern in point of time the waning influence of a quitting tenant and the increasing influence of his successor? If the goodwill was adherent, how could the purchaser recreate it, or how could he drive it away except by bad management which would spell his own bankruptcy? It was true that, as an agent of production, the trader provided the channel through which the needs of the community were satisfied, but he did not create those needs, and he could control their custom only within very restricted limits. The bulk of the custom acted like a flywheel, giving a more or less enduring momentum independent of the efforts of the trader; customers did not normally transfer their custom elsewhere on a change of tradesmen. In his submission the diminution factor could not be properly applied to adherent goodwill.

There was one common factor about the bulk of retail businesses ; most of them toed the normal rent line, and whilst there were some that could show the goodwill of a trade profit in advance of that line, they did so on a capacity to earn super-profits. Rent did not march in a distinct ratio to varying profits, but that was a matter for the valuer in fixing an appropriate years' purchase to the goodwill rent when assessing the compensation.

Mr. Head raised in his Paper the important question of the meaning of the word " holding " in Section 4 (1), proviso (a). He agreed with Mr. Head that the word " holding " referred only to the classes of hereditament to which Part 1 applied, and that the word was not defined anywhere in the Act as meaning freehold tenure (nor on the contrary), but he would like to ask Mr. Head if the first provision of Section 8 (1) did not give him the direction he sought on the point. That provision clearly contemplated a payment of compensation for goodwill which might not be exhausted during the mesne landlord's term, and would seem to be sufficient authority for the view that the words " value of the holding " meant value of the holding irrespective of all mesne interests, i.e., the freehold value. Mr. Head said that he was driven to another view by force of experience, but, with respect, he personally thought it could only be either perpetuity or the term held by the immediate landlord (he could find no authority for adopting a term of fourteen years unless that happened to coincide with the immediate landlord's own term), and, looking at Section 8 (1), he inclined to the freehold interpretation.

He did not know whether Mr. Head had any particular information to warrant the inference he drew from the introduction of a maximum time limit of fourteen years in the granting of new leases in lieu of compensation. There was no time limit in the Bill as originally introduced, and it was not possible to know what was in the minds of the movers of the several amendments which sought to impose time limits of varying duration, but he would hesitate to accept the view that the adopted limit of fourteen years was dictated by any such consideration as the probable duration of the tenant's influence. He would rather think that the time limit was perhaps directed to facilitating the proceedings before the tribunal by reducing the number of owners of reversionary interests to be joined in the tenant's application for a new lease.

Having ventured to criticise Mr. Head's method of assessing goodwill compensation, he would attempt to turn that criticism into the constructive channel of an alternative method, the consideration of which might be facilitated by bearing in mind certain fundamentals which, in his opinion, governed the law of rent in its relation to goodwill. Those considerations were as follows:—

(1) In common speech rent was spoken of only when owner and occupier were distinct persons, but in the economic sense there was rent when the occupier was also the owner. Rent was also expressed in a selling price.

(2) The term "rent" in its economic meaning distinguished the payment for the use of buildings and other improvements as interest on capital, and only that part was rent which constituted the consideration for the use of land, i.e., land value. The distinction was important when one came to apply rates of interest.

(3) Saleable goodwill could not properly arise until prudent capital expenditure had been sufficiently rewarded, otherwise capital would cease to flow into buildings and improvements.

(4) (i.) If the payment for the use and occupation of trade premises was insufficient to meet interest and sinking fund charges on prudent capital expenditure, there was no land value for the particular user, and, by consequence, there could be no adherent goodwill; (ii.) if the payment for use and occupation exceeded the interest on capital, the surplus was land value; and (iii.) if the rental value of the premises for the particular trade or business was greater than their ordinary market value for any other purpose, there was adherent goodwill by reason of the carrying on of that particular trade or business.

(5) Land value was the landlord's share of the profits issuing out of the use and occupation of land; the land value of a shop in Regent Street was greater than that of the sheep grazings on the Welsh mountains, though the one was measured in square feet and the other in square miles.

(6) Speaking broadly, the present land value of business premises had been built up of the adherent goodwill of past generations of tenants. Prior to the 1927 Act the quitting tenant's goodwill passed to the landlord, without payment, to the extent that it was convertible into an increased rent payable by the succeeding tenant.

(7) Expressed in terms of an addition to the value of the holding, adherent goodwill was land value, and to the extent that it exceeded the normal level of the land values of the particular neighbourhood it was more or less speculative; that was to say, speculative until the normal level of land values again advanced to absorb it.

(8) One other fundamental—arguable perhaps, though not on

Mr. Head's Paper ; goodwill was neither the creation of the landlord nor the creation of the tenant. The organisation of a Selfridge or a Woolworth, wedded to the most modern establishment imaginable, could not produce, if situated in the remoter parts of the Highlands, a goodwill worth a halfpenny.

In his opinion progressive goodwill marched with and was the cause of progressive rent or land value, as might be illustrated by the wholesale absorption of goodwill in rent in the boom period of a few years ago, when many shop rents all over the country were doubled and sometimes trebled, the variation of increase being broadly attributable to the varying importance of sites and not to the buildings and improvements on them. The increase of rent in those cases was an increase of land value.

Goodwill could be distinguished as a super-profit remaining after provision had been made for (1) rent, rates and taxes ; and (2) tenant's remuneration and interest on his capital. Where such a surplus was available it was divisible as to part as potential rent and as to part as tenant's additional remuneration, according to the circumstances of the particular case. Only that part which was capable of conversion into rent was "goodwill "attached to the premises by reason of the carrying on by the "tenant or his predecessors in title . . . . of a trade or business," and would form the subject of a compensation payment to the tenant (not the landlord), for the important feature of this Act was the co-partnership of landlord and tenant in the land values of trading premises. If there were no available surplus profit, there could be no compensation.

If it were correct to say that in an economic dissection of rent (as that term was commonly used) adherent goodwill was land value, the dominant factor in assessing compensation under Section 4 was not the duration of the tenant's influence but the general movement of land values in the particular neighbourhood, regard being had to the special features of the particular site for any purpose. On that footing it would follow, quite logically, he thought, that in localities where land values advanced slowly, the risk attendant upon the maintenance of an inherent goodwill (dependent solely upon a particular trade or business) would be much greater than where land values were expected to advance quickly, and it was that expected movement of land values which, in his opinion, indicated the appropriate years' purchase to be applied to the rental equivalent of such goodwill. It should be borne in mind, in the present connection, that in a quickly developing locality the potential element of market rent would tend to absorb some part of inherent goodwill and remove it from the ambit of compensation.

It would also follow that, where the normal level of land values had not advanced during the term of the lease, the tenant's compensation should approximate the landlord's gain, and, as a general rule, it was only in such circumstances that the quitting tenant would be compensated for what the landlord gained. A notable exception was provided where the succeeding tenant was a multiple firm, occupying for a different and more profitable purpose and usually paying a multiple rent well in advance of the normal rent line. In that case, where the landlord's gain was the greatest, the unfortunate quitting tenant would get no compensation for the diversion elsewhere of his otherwise adherent goodwill.

Where there had been an advance of the normal line of land values during the term of the lease, the tenant's compensation would be correspondingly reduced, for—it was important to note—he was not to be compensated for the increased value of the holding directly attributable to the carrying on there of his business, but only for that measure of increase which exceeded that which any other business would have produced. A renewal of his lease would not wholly conserve the tenant's goodwill in such a case, for the same measure of his goodwill would be absorbed in the set-off of market rent payable under the new lease.

In his submission Section 4 goodwill should be assessed by reference to two factors only: (1) the estimated ordinary market rent of the premises for any business other than that of the quitting tenant, and (2) the estimated rent which, with the attached goodwill, the premises would command. The value attributable to buildings, &c., was common to both estimates, the difference being a difference of land value only.

Only where the second exceeded the first estimate would a prima facie case for compensation be established. The second estimate would involve a calculation not of the adherent profit (as in the typical valuation given by Mr. Head), but of the landlord's share of the total trade profits expressed in terms of the "higher rent" referred to in Section 4 (1), for the difference between those two estimates was the benefit—and the whole of the benefit—accruing to the landlord at the termination of the tenancy.

There remained the question of the appropriate years' purchase to apply to the "difference" to which he had just referred, and that would depend upon the risk attending the maintenance of the excess of adherent goodwill beyond the line of ordinary market value. When a landlord, after paying goodwill compensation to his quitting tenant, sought advice as to the increased rental value of his premises by reason of the adherent goodwill, it would be given without hesitation, nor would any insuperable difficulty be experienced in estimating the capital value of the premises in like conditions. Precisely the same considerations should apply to an assessment of the compensation payable to the quitting tenant.

He could imagine a general desire on the part of landlords to recoup themselves for the compensation paid to the quitting tenant by demanding a premium or an equivalent amount for a new lease to a new tenant. That procedure, if successful, would avoid the risk which Mr. Head provided for by a relatively high rate of interest when translating compensation into a rental equivalent.

The apprehensions expressed by Mr. Head as to the duplication of compensation could not arise on the method of assessment to which he referred ; a record of the goodwill rent fixed on the last previous occasion would secure the landlord from that risk.

In supporting the vote of thanks to Mr. Head, he would like to pay tribute to his courage. It needed considerable courage to illustrate by figures the process of assessment described in the Paper, open as they were to the criticism of anyone who wanted to make his case out of particular figures. He also wanted to assure Mr. Head that, if he differed from him in principle, he did so with deference to Mr. Head's experience. His own task had been very much easier than that of Mr. Head.

Mr. W. E. A. BULL (Professional Associate of Council) said that in Table I. Mr. Head estimated the profits for a duration of fourteen years and a rate of interest at 15 per cent., and in Table II. he gave varying duration and varying percentages. He then provided for a modification of the mathematical multiplier, as he called it, in accordance with the divergence of the current customary years' purchase from what he termed the typical customary years' purchase. He (Mr. Bull) was afraid he could not follow that. It seemed to him that, if a valuer estimated correctly the rate per cent. which the purchaser of a business would require and estimated accurately the duration of the vendor's influence, the valuer had done all that he was required to do, and if he attempted afterwards to modify that figure in the way he had just described, he would be doing again what he had already done. Mr. Head seemed doubtful about it himself, because he said, at the bottom of page 114 of the "Journal," that the variation now from the former three years' purchase to two years' purchase was no doubt due to the importation of an allowance for shorter duration and larger risk, whereas on the next page he said that the customary multiplier failed because it took no account of the duration of the tenant's interest.

The other matter to which he wished to refer was the typical valuation, in which Mr. Head suggested that there was an adherent net profit of £300, being one-third of the original true net profit of £900. Personally he thought that, in estimating adherent goodwill, one should always endeavour to look at the matter originally from the point of view of adherent gross profit. Turning the net profit into the equivalent gross profit, one arrived at the fact, since the overheads were standard in both cases, that, if £900 was the true net profit of the whole business and one added what would be normal outgoings, the original gross profit for the whole business would be £1,450 per annum if a rent of £100 per annum was paid. If one assumed that there would be an adherent net profit of £300 a year, it meant that one assumed there would be an adherent gross profit of £850 out of the original gross profit of £1,450. In other words, in the typical valuation one assumed that about 60 per cent. of the original tenant's trade would adhere to the premises for the benefit of the landlord.

As had been pointed out by a previous speaker, the capital value of what was said to be the adherent net profit was compared afterwards with the capital value of the difference between what was the lease rent and what was the market rent, and if that market rent in this particular case had increased from £150 to 175, so that in fact there was an increase in rental value of £75, the whole of the tenant's compensation would be automatically extinguished, although on the facts of the typical valuation about 60 per cent. of the tenant's trade was held to adhere to the premises. If the present rental value was £150 and the original rent under the lease had been £75, the case would be even worse. The tenant's profit would have been very little altered, whereas again his compensation would be entirely extinguished. He had to confess that he could not distinguish any relationship of value in estimating compensation under the Act between the increase in rental value, from the date of the commencement of the lease to the end, and any capital value attributable to adherent goodwill. As the last speaker had said—and he was pleased to hear it, because he happened to have said it four years ago in a Paper he read—surely the simplest and most direct method of doing what the Act in so many words told one to do was to estimate the additional rental value obtainable by the landlord above the market value due to the tenant having carried on a trade in those premises before. How much rent more than the market rent could be got for the premises for a trade of the same nature as the tenant's trade, by reason of his having carried on his trade there for so long? Surely, if the Act said that that was what the tenant had to prove in order to get any compensation at all, it was the best and, indeed, the only criterion available to surveyors for estimating the compensation. It was a very difficult matter, and Mr. Head, in the space allotted to him, had not been able to indicate any way in which surveyors could estimate the proportion of the adherent profit, which was the most difficult thing in the whole Act. If Mr. Head in his reply could give some indication, from his vast experience, of how an estimate of the adherent profit could be arrived at, and, from that, an estimate of the adherent rent, he was sure all the members would be exceedingly grateful to him.

Mr. HARRY G. ASSITER (Fellow) suggested that as the Paper had dealt with an important subject which lent itself to a lot of discussion, and as there had been at least three Papers read that evening, one—the chief—by Mr. Head, one by Mr. Merlin, and another by the Chief Valuer, as well as the very interesting and informatory address by Mr. Foa, the question of an adjournment might be considered so that there might be an opportunity for further discussion.

The PRESIDENT, in putting the vote of thanks to the members, said with regard to Mr. Assiter's remarks the Council would bear the point in mind. It would be realised that in the old days when meetings were adjourned the Paper had always been read at full length and took an hour. Nowadays the Paper was not read but was issued to all the members before the meeting, and hitherto it had not been found necessary to adjourn the meeting, as the number of people speaking as a rule had finished before it was time to go.

The vote of thanks was carried by acclamation.

RECENT DEVELOPMENT IN DOMESTIC DRAINAGE AND SANITATION.

By W. H. Scanlan (Chartered Surveyor).

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Chartered Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 5th March, 1934.

In the Paper read by that distinguished Fellow of The Institution, Mr. E. H. Blake, in 1906, he opened as follows: " Sanitation has been only tardily recognised as " a science." That was unquestionably a truism which is confirmed by a study of the history of drainage. Sanitary law was in a chaotic state until the later part of the 19th century, and the science of sewage disposal and sanitary equipment had not received the serious consideration it merited. With the passing of the Metropolis (Local Management) Act, 1855, the Public Health Act, 1875, and the numerous amending Acts, the importance of efficient drainage was manifest. Any building, no matter what its construction, with improper sanitary services must be a source of danger to public health, besides causing discomfort and inconvenience to the occupants.

Science, to be worthy of the name, must be progressive, and I think it will be agreed that to an extent it can be said that sanitary science has satisfied this qualification. There is, however, much to be done, but prejudice is always a deterrent.

Progress in this matter is, however, difficult for several reasons, firstly, it is much too important a matter to permit of unrestricted experiments in practice, and, secondly, the various and varied by-laws laid down by different authorities must be observed. These latter are frequently in need of revision, and whilst some authorities are progressive, the majority are content to insist upon compliance with the principles laid down over twenty years ago. For example, it was not until 1930 that the by-laws laid down by the London County Council were examined and brought into line with contemporary developments. There are, however, at the present time several progressive public officials and authorities who appreciate the necessity of improving the existing systems of drainage, and one of the results of their efforts has been the acceptance of the " one-pipe " system which I will discuss later.

Reverting for a moment to the question of by-laws, I am sure that architects and surveyors will agree that it is desirable to have uniformity in these. Whilst the broad principles are more or less the same in all districts, there is, nevertheless, considerable difference in their interpretation and application. What is considered necessary by one sanitary authority is by another forbidden. For example, if a high standard of modern drainage were submitted to an authority where the by-laws were prepared in, say, 1900, it would, in all probability, be disapproved. I fully appreciate the difficulties attached to the alteration of local by-laws, but suggest that responsible authorities should hasten to accept modifications which are an advance on existing practices.

A note on the history of the Model By-laws may be of interest. The original series was issued by the Local Government Board in 1877, and this was amended from time to time until the end of last century. In 1901 a series was issued for rural authorities, followed, in 1903, by an entirely new set for urban authorities ; these were revised in 1905 and again in 1912.

In 1914 a Departmental Committee was set up to consider the control over the erection of buildings, &c., and presented their Report in 1918. There followed various emendations of the various series.

In 1930 it was decided to issue a further set of Model By-laws, and it should be noted that in the ten years preceding 1930 nearly 1,600 series of by-laws had been confirmed by the Government Authority.

It is evident from this that local authorities appreciated their responsibilities, but it also indicates the point made as to the difficulties of the subject.

The Ministry of Health issued Model By-laws for urban authorities last year, and I suggest that it would be of advantage to all concerned were it possible to provide for the immediate adoption of these over the whole of the country. This would ensure consistency and a high standard of drainage such as the large developments now proceeding merit.

I will not make any comment upon these Model By-laws except to indicate two important foot-notes upon matters which I mention later:—

> (1) " In administering this group of by-laws the Council will accept the specifications issued from time to time by the British Standards Institution, but may challenge materials not complying with those specifications. Similarly, in connection with the making of joints, they will accept the methods recommended by the Institute of Plumbers in their specifications for the installation of soil, waste and ventilating pipes, but may challenge any other method."
> (2) " If the local authority, looking to the recommendations of the Departmental Committee on Intercepting Traps, think it unnecessary to require traps in drains communicating with sewers, they may omit the appropriate words from their by-laws." [Abbrev.]

The importance of the first will be significant, and the second is a point of divergent opinion. I will touch upon these under the appropriate headings.

Having considered the development of by-laws upon which development is dependent, I will proceed to an examination of the various components of a drainage system and sanitary installations.

DRAINS.

The construction of these remains much the same as for the past decade. Stoneware pipes jointed and set in cement are generally used in urban districts and where the drain runs outside a building. Conditionally, upon the stoneware being well glazed and the joints carefully made, it is sound and economical. Cast iron is being used more extensively, and has the advantage over stoneware of withstanding settlements and having less joints.

Reinforced concrete is not yet being utilised except for sewers.

Manholes and gullies can be considered to have reached a satisfactory stage of efficiency.

In the previous part of my Paper I called attention to the proviso to the Model By-laws in reference to intercepting traps. It is evident from this that the desirability of these is a question of doubt, and it is therefore permissible to consider the functions of this trap. It is primarily intended to intercept the passing of sewer gas into the drainage system, but personally, whilst admitting this would be necessary if offensive gases were usually present in sewers, I do not consider the disadvantages warrant its use. Firstly, it acts as an obstruction to the unrestricted flow from the drain into the sewer, and, secondly, it collects solids which remain until there is a sufficient flushing of the drain to clear same. Further, the stopper with which it is fitted is often displaced, and causes obstruction or stoppage. I know there are many who will disagree with me on this point, and it will be interesting to have their criticisms.

In the light of recent developments, the soil waste pipes may now be called drains, but I will deal with these separately, as the development of these is, perhaps, the most important part of this Paper.

SOIL AND WASTE PIPES.

It is when we consider this section of the drainage system that we arrive at what is the most recent and far-reaching development in sanitary installations. I refer to what has been called the " one-pipe " system.

This is, briefly, one main stack taking the discharge from fittings with a main ventilating or anti-siphon pipe taking all branch vents.

The design of the system is of primary importance ; inefficient lay-out would possibly result in all the arguments heard against it being amply justified. It is also essential that the plumbing work is executed in the most suitable materials and carefully supervised. For these reasons it is desirable that the work is carried out only by qualified craftsmen able to calculate the relative sizes of the pipes required to deal with the discharges and vents to prevent siphonic action and back pressure.

It is generally accepted as the greatest advance in plumbing that has been made for many years. On consideration, however, one fails to understand why the principle has not been accepted before, as many of us must have given at least some passing thought to the necessity for separate soil and waste pipes. We are, however, usually content to accept present practices, and any suggested change in recognised principles or standards meets with opposition and reasoned criticism. The " one-pipe " system has been no exception to this ; discussions and inquiries have been held by the various interested bodies.

It is not, however, a new idea, the method having been in use for many years in the United States, and our sanitary engineers have no doubt obtained much useful data from the experience gained in that country.

The Committee of the Conference on Building Regulations recommend its adoption as a sound proposition. The Ministry of Health have indicated that they are prepared to approve the system, whilst the London County Council and the Corporation of the City of London are preparing by-laws which will sanction such schemes. In the case of the London County Council, consent has already been given to its use in a large hotel and blocks of flats in the St. Marylebone district. The former is already in use, and, I am informed, is functioning satisfactorily. These two buildings should provide a stringent test for the reason that the number of fittings proportionate to the size of the building is a very high one.

There remains, however, a diversity of opinion as to whether its advantages qualify a general acceptance of its principles, and some hold the view that it does not constitute a progressive step. It is, therefore, opportune to examine the existing dual-pipe system of waste and soil discharges, and for the purposes of this Paper I will examine what, in my opinion, are the disadvantages of this.

From an æsthetic view point all architects and surveyors are agreed that the multiplicity of soil, waste, anti-siphon and rain-water pipes present a problem which is often difficult to solve. Bends and swan-necks have to be utilised, and these interfere with the rapid discharge and flow to the drain.

The waste and soil pipes often run down side by side, both fulfilling the same purpose and leading to a common drain ; the waste, however, must discharge into a gulley before entering the drain. What is the function of this? Until a few years ago the practice was for the waste to discharge into the gulley over the grating either direct or by means of a channel. It is now permitted in most districts to enter the gulley under the grating. I suggest its purpose is to prevent solids entering the drain or to provide a grease trap. The effect of this is to cause an accumulation of foul matter disintegrating usually under a window, with the result that objectionable gases rise up the waste pipe and, where fittings are improperly trapped, into the building.

It is still, furthermore, a common practice to find sinks being fixed outside London without traps, for the reason, I have heard put forward, that they are not necessary where the waste discharges over a gulley.

In the majority of cases gullies rarely receive the periodic cleansing and flushing that is required, and the concrete surround usually provides defects wherein filth accumulates and percolation has been found to exist into the surrounding ground.

Where, in large blocks of buildings, central areas are provided for the ventilation of the domestic apartments, it is common for complaints to arise by reason of offensive smells from gullies caused especially by vegetable water. The fashionable preparations now being used in baths for medical purposes often result in stoppages and overflow of waste gullies, and this latter also results from the force of water descending into the gulley from a long waste pipe.

The present system cannot therefore be considered satisfactory, and for this reason we should, without delay, accept any modification which, after careful examination, removes the grounds of objection and possible danger to public health.

Having considered the disadvantages of the present system, I will pass to the arguments and objections that have been made to the adoption of the " one-pipe " system.

It has been stressed that the dangers of back pressure and siphonage will be increased, and that in the event of the water-seal being broken or evaporated the resultant nuisance aggravated. Further, that the effects of expansion and contraction are likely to accentuate defects in the plumbing.

These objections, I contend, merit an answer only if it is accepted that modern knowledge of sanitary science and plumbing are not sufficient to provide a system designed to prevent the possibility of these defects arising, and are dealt with later in the Paper.

Some architects state that to utilise the system it will be necessary to group the sanitary fittings which may react on convenient planning. This is agreed, but in my opinion this feature is usually found in the design of all modern buildings.

A further objection made is that it will, in most cases, be necessary to employ specialist plumbers or sanitary engineers. This cannot really be considered seriously, for the reasons that, in the case of large buildings, it is desirable to have the advice of the specialist, and, secondly, the saving in cost will merit any fees to be paid for the preparation of the lay-out of the system.

The advantages claimed for the " one-pipe " system are saving in costs of installation (increasing proportionately to the number of fittings) ; the more rapid removal of waste discharges ; reduction in number of gullies and connections to the drain ; more efficient flushing of the stack pipe, with consequent prolongation of its life ; maintenance costs will be reduced, and a saving of space required for plumbing by reason of the fewer pipes. Lastly, from the architectural view point it is definitely preferable.

It is already evident that this development in drainage will be extensively used, and when by-laws are amended to permit of its use without special application, the installation of the dual system will practically cease, except in small buildings.

In the remaining headings of this Paper I will make special reference to any variation in existing practices which are necessary in regard to the " one-pipe " system.

VENTILATION.

The necessity for efficient ventilation of drainage systems has been recognised for many years. Soil-pipe fittings have always had ventilating pipes where more than one fitting discharged into a common pipe, but this provision in the case of waste pipes was not required until a few years ago. Branches were originally discharged into open hopper heads.

When waste pipes with proper joints were adopted, puff pipes were introduced to prevent siphonage and regurgitation, but these were found to be unsatisfactory. These two methods are still being used outside the metropolis.

In the London County Council area and some of the larger cities ventilating pipes must now be fitted to the waste-pipe system, with branches to the trap of each fitting.

With the " one-pipe " system a sound ventilating system is a vital necessity, and one might state the most important factor required to ensure each fitting functioning satisfactorily. It must be recognised that the possibility of coincident discharges are greater, and consequently compression is increased in the lower part of the stack. Siphonage is also more likely to be induced from this cause.

The water seal in the traps is easily broken by a small vacuum, and this must be guarded against by equalising, so far as is possible, the air pressure in the pipes. It is the function of the ventilating pipes to maintain equilibrium and so prevent the water seal in the traps being broken. The necessity of carefully designing the ventilating system is more important in the " one-pipe " system than in the case of separate soil and waste pipes, and the point of connection to the branches is somewhat different. Until experience is gained, it is advisable to vent each branch, and this should include those to fittings on the top floor. The necessity for the latter has often been discussed, and theoretically there does not appear to be any need to ventilate a single branch in this position. It can safely be said that it is an advantage to ventilate any branch, and this should be sufficient reason for doing so.

In the dual system the vent pipe is taken from a point just behind the trap, and where the joint is properly made, acts satisfactorily. The " one-pipe " system is dealt with rather differently. The connection of the vent to the waste pipe should be made at a point above the hydraulic gradient to protect it against back-flow and stoppage, and, further, it must be returned to the vent pipe. The sketch below illustrates this point.

It will be noticed that it is an advantage to have the lavatory basin fixed at the end of the branch, as this arrangement provides the more simple vent, also that " P " traps

The main ventilating pipe should be carried up and not returned into the soil pipe. This briefly explains the principle adopted.

Under the heading " Drains " I mentioned the disputation in regard to the necessity of intercepting traps, and co-related to this is the fresh-air inlet. The position in which this is usually fixed is such that a nuisance can and does arise from the fact that the mica flap is a bad fitting, with the resultant effect of the air inlet becoming an outlet. This has been recognised in some districts where it is required to carry this pipe up to a similar height as the soil or main vent pipe ; but it would then appear to lose its function as a fresh-air inlet as equal atmospheric pressure occurs in each vertical pipe of similar height. It is, therefore, pertinent to suggest that both the interceptor and its component, fresh-air inlet, are not required, and may disappear from the drainage systems of the future.

TRAPS.

The consideration of traps is closely related to ventilation, and there are now many different types on the market, the makers of which claim that they resist siphonage without the fitting of a ventilating or anti-siphon pipe. It is not within the province of this Paper to discuss their relative merits, except to state that I have not found some of these to be satisfactory in practice. Others have been used in small systems, and appear to function satisfactorily. The disadvantage of this type of trap is that the particular branch to which it is fitted cannot be air washed as in the case of a ventilated system. In my opinion they do not appear to be suitable for use in a large installation on the " one-pipe " system.

" P " or " S " traps with a water seal of about 3 inches, fixed as near to the outlet from the fitting as possible, provide a satisfactory protection with self-cleansing properties. " P " traps will generally be found more suitable for baths, sinks and lavatory basins in the " one-pipe " system. A short branch can then be taken into the vertical waste which is continued upwards as the vent shown on the drawing.

Traps with an open web should be used whenever possible. This, I appreciate, is difficult with some modern fittings, but the advantage is obvious.

Access caps should be fitted for cleansing below the water seal.

Water-closets require a seal of about 1¾ inch, and the fact that these are usually made to comply with the by-laws relieves us of responsibility.

When discussing traps, the question of evaporation might be considered. The danger of this cannot altogether be overcome where fittings are not used for a long period. It has been noted that the water in the trap of the water-closet evaporates much more quickly than in the case of a waste trap, due doubtless to the fact the surface is exposed and of greater superficial area.

Proper ventilation mitigates the danger of a diffusion of gases through a bad trap.

MATERIALS.

The materials generally used for soil and waste pipes are coated cast iron or lead, and have been found satisfactory. Lead is easily worked and resists corrosion, but has the disadvantage of excessive expansion and contraction, and is for this reason unsuited to the " one-pipe " system where the hot water from baths, &c., would be discharged into it, except for branches and traps where it permits of slight movement in the fitting without causing a fracture.

Of these two materials, coated cast iron is to be preferred ; it possesses similar qualities to lead, although its life may not be so long, especially above the top branch. The joints are easily made, both to junctions and lead branches.

Copper is becoming increasingly popular, but plumbers generally are not yet skilled in the welding of this material.

Compression joints are favoured by some, but properly welded joints are the most satisfactory for drainage work.

Galvanised wrought iron has the advantage of a screwed joint, but it has been found in practice that the life of this material when used for ventilating or waste pipes has only been about twenty years ; corrosion occurs where the pipes have been cut.

The sizes of the various pipes will, of course, depend upon the number of fittings, but in this connection it should be appreciated that the average sizes used to-day are sufficient for most buildings where the "one-pipe" system is used. Investigation has proved that too large a section results in corrosion or disintegration occurring in the pipe, and, further, it is not cleansed by discharges. It will be remembered that a few years ago the minimum size of the soil pipe was reduced from 3½ inches to 3 inches.

Fear has been expressed in some quarters that the main stack, even of cast iron or copper, will become defective by reason of the excessive expansion and contraction due to the discharge of hot and cold water into it, but one has to appreciate that with a well-designed system the water will pass away so rapidly that its effect must be small. The effect is more likely to be manifest in the branches, and it is for this reason I consider lead preferable for these.

There are, however, some sanitary engineers who consider expansion joints desirable, and are fitting them as a safeguard.

The method of making the joints between branches and fittings, &c., is set out in the by-laws. The most important is that to the w.c., and I have experienced many instances of this breaking, consequent upon movement in the fitting or building. A more elastic joint is required here to overcome this possible defect arising often in a position where it is not apparent.

The success of any material depends largely upon the craftsmen, and it is for this reason that care is necessary in engaging workmen who are efficient and well trained. It is held in many quarters that plumbers should pass a qualifying examination, and when one considers the possible dangers to public health from bad workmanship, it is somewhat difficult to disagree with the contention. If, however, local authorities adopt the suggestion mentioned in the Model By-laws, that materials should comply with the specification of the British Standards Institution and with the methods recommended by the Institute of Plumbers for the making of joints, there should be no cause for complaint in regard to these matters.

All installations are, of course, tested on completion, but this might not disclose some weakness which would only be apparent after a period of use. The method of testing usually adopted is by air pressure, and should be carried out both before and after the fittings are fixed. The water test is the most stringent for horizontal drains, and whilst it may be unfair in the case of old drains if too large a head of water is used, newly laid drains should withstand this test.

FITTINGS.

The construction of water-closets has reached a satisfactory standard, having good flushing and cleansing qualities. Valve closets are rapidly disappearing. This was a good fitting in many ways, but the constant necessity of adjusting the working parts was a source of trouble. Where a similar fitting is required the " siphonic " type is being used, and this is a better fitting and is equally silent in operation.

Perhaps the most popular type of water-closet is that with a low down water-waste preventer, which is operated by a lever in place of the chain fitting. This type has one disadvantage in that, by reason of the position of the water cistern, the force of discharge into the basin is decreased. This results in reduced efficiency, and it is desirable to use a basin with a specially shaped flushing rim.

Twenty years ago baths were enclosed with hardwood surrounds, but it was found that these were insanitary, and for many years baths have been fitted without enclosures. To-day we again hide the sides of the fittings with panels made of marble, slate or other materials, building the rim into the walls or tiling. This is certainly more pleasing, and gives no grounds for objection provided the work is properly executed and the joints made tight with access to traps.

Lavatory basins and sinks have shown little improvement in design beyond the pedestal basin, in which the waste and service pipes are taken from the fitting. It is when the design of overflows is considered that one must admit the presence of a very insanitary feature. Small holes into a channel leading to the trap is the usual method of dealing with these, and it is difficult to conceive a more unsatisfactory design. This overflow invariably receives the waste from the soap dish and scum ; it is rarely, if ever, flushed or cleansed, with the result that it is a most frequent cause of nuisance. The most suitable overflow is that known as the " Weir," and I submit that the perforated pattern should be improved to facilitate cleansing or the " Weir " type made standard.

Sinks of the " Butler " type are now generally used. Drainage boards are fitted to most sinks, and it should be possible to provide an improved method of attaching these to the sink, or the forming of a joint in the casting of the sink which will prevent water creeping underneath the draining board.

WATER STORAGE AND SUPPLIES.

The various bodies responsible for the supply of water for domestic use have developed the methods of purification to a very high standard, and by a system of careful and continual analysis of samples taken from the sources of supply and from mains are ever guarding the public health against possible disease. In the metropolis a staff of chemists are engaged testing the samples taken each day. This is, of course, very reassuring and satisfactory, but when one examines the storage cisterns in buildings there is cause for complaint and reason for improvement. The Water Board make regulations for the storage of water in supply cisterns, but there are no by-laws providing for the protection of these against contamination and becoming the receptacle for dirt and often filth. How often does one find a water storage cistern covered, and, if covered, the wood rotted and floating on top of the water! The usual position is in the roof, often surrounded with the household rubbish, and in old houses the position is frequently in the open. It is admitted that in each house one tap is, or should be, taken direct from the main supply for drinking purposes, but it is reasonable to assume that more than 50 per cent. of the drinking water is taken from a fitting supplied via the storage cistern.

A sanitary officer informed me of an instance when, in making an inspection, he discovered dead mice in such a storage cistern, and I had the experience, when making a survey, of discovering a long-lost family joint in a similar receptacle.

It is therefore pertinent to suggest that this is a condition which should receive attention at the hands of the competent authorities.

Domestic hot-water installations have become a feature in all modern homes, and these have added to the comfort of all classes. In many cases, by using the combined hot-water cylinder, a system of central heating is obtained, thus assisting in some small measure to the alleviation of the smoke nuisance.

The "one-pipe" system was the development which suggested this Paper. It was, however, found necessary to digress and consider other parts of the sanitary system. I trust that the references to these will be found useful and interesting matters for discussion, apart from the purely technical consideration and formulas that would have been attached to a consideration of the "one-pipe" system alone.

SESSION 1933-1934.

PLANNING IN RELATION TO FUTURE POPULATION.

(Correction to be made in the discussion on Professor A. M. Carr-Saunders' Paper.)

Professor C. B. FAWCETT (Visitor) has sent the following corrections to his remarks on Professor Carr-Saunders' Paper. They should be inserted in place of the two paragraphs previously sent in by him on the lower half of page 100 (see "Journal" for February, 1934, Transactions section):—

Take 240,000 for Professor Carr-Saunders' figure of "from "200,000 to 250,000 as the ideal population of a town." Then calculate from the suggested town-planning maximum of twelve houses to the acre, assuming five persons per house, and we find that the residential parts of the town will need an area of somewhat more than 4,000 acres. It is much more difficult to make even an approximate estimate of the area needed for the non-residential urban occupation of the ground, such as factories, warehouses and offices; transport ways with their depôts, yards and docks; shops, halls and threatres; churches and schools; parks and recreation grounds; and so on. But it is probable that these need more ground than the purely residential developments. Hence it may be fair to estimate the area needed for such a town at 10,000 acres, or fifteen square miles in round numbers. If such a town were built in the most compact form its central district would be more than two miles from the open country, while the residents in the outskirts would be at the same distance from the centre. Since the compact circular form is rarely practicable, these distances would usually be exceeded.

On this basis the whole town population of Great Britain would need an urban area of about 2,500 square miles. This is nearly a tenth of the area of the English lowland, rather less than half that of Yorkshire, and nearly equal to the combined areas of the counties of Kent, Surrey, London, and Middlesex.

GOODWILL:

With Special Reference to the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927.

Written reply received from Mr. J. George Head to points raised in the discussion on his Paper of 5th February, 1934:—

In reply to the comment and criticism of those who took part in the debate of 5th February last, I propose, with a view of avoiding repetition, to deal with them in the natural sequence of the subject instead of adhering to the actual order in which they were made.

I begin, therefore, with those set up by Sir Harriss Firth, because they deal with matter so fundamental as to strike at the very foundation of the methods suggested in the Paper.

In the first place, Sir Harriss Firth queries whether it is really possible so to separate goodwill from rent as to assign to any individual a right to compensation in respect thereof in the form of adherent goodwill. Sir Harriss Firth states that all rental value, above prairie value, arises from the accumulated goodwill of traders who have passed away; in other words, he regards all rental value as "accumulated goodwill." That is a pregnant thought with which probably none of us will be disposed to quarrel. Does not his statement, however, involve the companion thought—that the accumulation has been, and still is, a continuing process, and that at any point in its progress it might have been possible to intervene and ascertain by what particular individual the continuance of the process was then being effected? Surely that is precisely what the 1927 Act has done. It has stepped in, and has said that the man who during the last five years has been adding the material for " accumulation " shall have the benefit of his efforts secured to him.

In the view of the Legislature, therefore, there does exist ownership of goodwill, an ownership which is capable of expression in terms of rent.

It is our duty to identify the extent of this ownership ; to segregate the proportion thereof which, by adhering to the premises, constitutes its " accumulation " ; to satisfy ourselves that it is reflected in higher rent ; to assess the addition to the value of the holding consequent thereon ; and to award to the tenant responsible for that additional value, compensation duly proportioned thereto.

The Act further directs that the tenant, in order to be entitled to compensation, must prove—

> " that goodwill has become attached to the premises by reason whereof the premises could be let at a higher rent than they would have realised had no such goodwill attached thereto:
> Provided that . . . . the compensation . . . . shall not exceed such addition to the value of the holding . . . . as may be determined to be the direct result of the carrying on of the trade or business."

From this direction two things emerge. First, that there must be a goodwill rent higher than that produced independently of the goodwill, i.e., in excess of the market rent ; and secondly, that there must be a consequent addition to the value of the holding.

It should be noted, however, that the creation of a higher rent is only a condition precedent to being entitled to compensation ; it is the addition to the value of the holding which has to be determined.

Our first duty, therefore, is—

(1) To satisfy ourselves that the goodwill does provide a " higher rent." This is ordinarily a matter of accounts.

(2) To satisfy ourselves that the higher rent is the " direct result " of the goodwill.

This involves a comparison between the goodwill benefit and that due to other causes.

(3) To determine the addition to the value of the holding.

This is obviously the excess, if any, shown by the comparison referred to above.

So far there is no difference of opinion. But now arises the question as to the method of calculation.

The Typical Valuation proceeds by way of capitalisation. It capitalises the incomes due respectively to adherent goodwill and to other causes, each by its appropriate years' purchase, and deducts one from the other. If the former be in excess, that excess is the measure of the tenant's compensation, the "higher "rent" being deduced therefrom.

Sir Harriss Firth, however, supported by Mr. Bull, inclines to the opinion that the calculation could be more satisfactorily performed by deriving the "higher rent" in some direct way from the average trade profits, rather than through the capitalisation of the adherent profit.

His words are that "the landlord would require market rent "in any event, and he would have thought it much easier and "more satisfactory to ascertain from the average trade profit of "the business 'a trade rental,' i.e., that portion of the trade "benefit which a tenant would be willing to pay (as rent) for "the opportunity of continuing his occupation and conserving his "profits."

Mr. Bull also voiced a similar opinion.

So far as this signifies that the object of our search is to be the excess of the goodwill, or trade rent, over the market rent, there is no difference between Sir Harriss Firth and the writer of the Paper; indeed, in the very important recent case of Whiteman Smith Motor Co. v. Chaplin and Another, their Lordships, Scrutton and Maugham, clearly stated that such goodwill rent was the primary thing to be ascertained, together with the addition to the value of the holding consequent thereon.

Now, these two items are precisely those which are arrived at by the Typical Valuation. But Sir Harriss Firth's challenge is to the method of calculation employed, and here, I think, his criticism is misconceived, for reasons which will appear in due course. As I understand the suggestion, the procedure would be as follows:—

(1) Ascertain the rental which the successor would pay, in excess of market rent, in consideration of the adherent goodwill.

(2) Capitalise this excess rent at its appropriate years' purchase, and thus determine the compensation due to the tenant.

This order of procedure appears so simple and direct as to commend itself to all at the outset.

But it is on paper only that it appears simple. The direction "ascertain the goodwill additional rent" reminds one of the old saying "First catch your hare." The ascertainment can be effected in two ways only, either by direct assessment of the goodwill rent from the adherent profit, or through the medium of capitalisation of the adherent profit. When direct assessment is attempted, the result, from lack of material on which to base the estimate, is, in my experience, little more than a guess. The evidence in this respect which is offered to the tribunal is usually unsatisfactory. Sometimes a witness for the tenant states that he would be prepared to pay for the privilege of following the claimant a rental of so much per annum above market rent. So far I have never found any satisfactory effort made to relate this statement to the profits on which the goodwill is founded, and which provide the only reason for the payment of an additional rent.

Neither is the witness bound in any way to fulfil his words, and the combined effort of these two factors is to render his evidence worthless.

On the other hand, imagine the surveyor charged with the duty of saying what a successor would pay annually for fourteen years in respect of the adherent goodwill of £300, mentioned in the Typical Valuation.

Undoubtedly he would have to capitalise it, and to redistribute it as rent over the term. It would appear, therefore, that the so-called "direct method" of arriving at the excess of goodwill rent over market rent, must, if it is to possess any reliability, proceed by way of capitalisation of the adherent profit in order to arrive at "the trade rental" contemplated by Sir Harriss Firth; so that capitalisation is a stage through which even the "direct "method" must pass. In the Typical Valuation the capital value of the £300 adherent profit is £651, and therefore the second stage is to turn this £651 into rent. Now it can only represent true rent up to the level of the market rent, which shows an excess over the lease rental value of £50, and beyond that it will be profit income rent.

Therefore, of the £651	651
a portion must be allocated sufficient to provide the £50 per annum for 14 years at 7 per cent. £50 × 8·75 =	437
The remainder	214
(being the addition to the value of the holding due directly to goodwill) amounts, when rentalised at 15 per cent. for 14 years, to ... and represents the "higher rent" of which we are in search.	37·4 p.a.

But this is the identical calculation of the Typical Valuation, and, frankly, I see no other means by which the "higher rent" can be obtained.

Mr. Merlin also challenges the principle of the Typical Valuation in the following words:—

> "He did not see anything in the Act, expressed or implied, requiring the increased rental value (due to the tenant's goodwill) to be compared with the increased rental value due to other causes."

I think I have already answered this in my reply (see page 175) to Sir Harriss Firth where I point out that the Act requires us to determine the addition to the "value of the "holding, which is the direct result of the carrying on of the "trade, &c."

But surely if we are to determine the addition which is the direct result of goodwill, we can only do so by eliminating that which is due to causes other than goodwill from the total increase which is due to all causes acting concurrently.

That which is the result of goodwill alone, i.e., "the direct "result," is obviously the amount of increase by which the goodwill benefit outstrips that due to other causes. Hence, the comparison shown in the Typical Valuation is, I suggest, implicit in the wording of the Act.

Mr. Merlin has also put a question which not only involves a principle similar to the one just dealt with, but which does so in a form which raises the point in the most definite form. He asks, is it fair to capitalise the adherent profit at 2·17 years' purchase and then to set up against it the additional rent due to other causes at 8·75 years' purchase? Why, he asks, should these forms of income be taken at different years' purchase? It is probable that no surveyor will be troubled by doubt as to the reason why business profits command a smaller years' purchase than rent. Nevertheless, for the sake of clarity it may be well to repeat that the capital value of any income depends upon the hazard thereof and upon the degree of trouble involved in securing its reception. For gilt-edge securities, of which the hazard and trouble are reduced to a minimum, the investor is prepared to accept the lowest rate of interest (at present 3½ per cent.).

Just according to the increase of hazard and trouble attending them, incomes from varying sources require a higher rate of interest and command a lower years' purchase. This declension is observed in its progress—through freehold ground rents, leasehold ground rents, freehold and leasehold rack rents, and weekly rents, and so on, down to trade earnings. Here hazard and trouble reach their highest and years' purchase their lowest levels.

Obviously, therefore, the trade earning of adherent profit on the one hand, and actual rent on the other hand, must be the subject of differing years' purchase, each being dealt with according to its proper level in the scale of securities. To use the same multiplier for both would be like removing the gold content from a combined mass of gold and lead, and allowing only the price of lead for the gold which is removed. Rent and profit must each be multiplied by its appropriate years' purchase, and this is what has been done in the Typical Valuation, which is, in that respect, correct.

Another criticism by Sir Harriss Firth was that, in his opinion, the adherent goodwill would not fade out provided the successor's conduct of the business were reasonably efficient, and that, therefore, the use of the diminution factor was not justified. Further, he doubted whether in any case it would be possible to identify the factor even if it did exist.

Mr. Bull also asked how it was to be calculated.

As to the existence of diminution in the tenant's influence bequeathed to the premises in the shape of adherent goodwill, the fact itself appears to me to be obvious. Surely it must in all cases be present, even if we go no further than the dying off or change of residence of the customers who remain. In other cases the ways of the new man, although reasonably efficient, might not suit them, with the result that their custom would be transferred elsewhere. Again, in the nature of the businesses themselves there is great variety. Some are more or less personal, and the tenant's influence would pass away in a shorter or longer time just in proportion as this element was present. In other cases the nature of the goods sold would be the predominant factor, and as long as they were supplied satisfactorily the adherence might be of long duration. Take, for instance, a milk business. So long as the milk is delivered regularly and is of good quality, the customer is not much concerned with the name of his dealer. This factor, with others, may account for the comparatively high number of years' purchase which can be obtained for a milk business. In any case the Act itself gives us a lead on the subject. Its principal object is to protect the interest of the tenant, and, with a view to doing so, it gives him power to demand a new lease in order to work out for himself the benefit which he would otherwise, at the end of his lease, leave to the advantage of the landlord. In fixing a maximum of fourteen years' lease, its authors have, I submit, indicated the maximum time which is required for him to do so.

As to Mr. Bull's question as to how the length of the duration is to be ascertained, I cannot do more than urge the surveyor to look into the matter on the lines suggested. There is no doubt that, whether defined or not, the durability of the tenant's influence is in some way reflected in the price which a purchaser is willing to pay for a business, and those who are accustomed to buy and sell businesses must be aware of the extent to which it is taken into consideration. There are other things which the surveyor will have to identify in connection with this complicated subject. In addition to the factor of duration, there will be the current sale price of the business, the proportion of the adherent profit, and other matters peculiar to the case under consideration, but it is the essence of a valuer's business to ascertain and identify " variables " of this nature, in order to estimate the gradation of value in a property which would otherwise have a fixed price.

The next question affecting the principle of the Paper was that asked by Mr. Stewart, who enquired whether the statement that the compensation to the tenant was to be measured by " the gain to the landlord " meant an actual gain or a hypothetical gain. His definition of a hypothetical gain was one where the tenant was adjudged entitled to compensation, but where, on claiming a new lease in lieu thereof, his claim was defeated by the statement on the part of the landlord under Section 5 (3) (b) that he required the premises for other purposes.

Since in such a case the adherent goodwill would be of no service to him, Mr. Stewart contends that there would be no gain to the landlord, and that consequently he ought not to have to pay compensation.

I think the answer is that the Act was passed in order to secure to the tenant that he should be paid, by way of compensation or of a new lease, for any additional value to the holding conferred by the adherent goodwill, by which the landlord might gain, and that the fact of the landlord renouncing the gain, which he might otherwise have had, would not free him from the duty of paying compensation to the tenant.

The amount of compensation is at the discretion of the tribunal, Section 5 (2), and there is a direction in the proviso to Section 4 (1) (a) that in such case they " shall have regard to " the effect of such change of user on the value of the goodwill " to the landlord."

Mr. Merlin instances that in 1930 claims might have been made by two tenants occupying identical shops, of which one was held at £100 per annum under an old lease dated 1900, and the other at £200 per annum on a lease dated 1915, the present market rental value being £300 in each case. He points out that where both tradesmen were making a net profit of £2,000 per annum, a most unequal result would be obtained in estimating the amounts of compensation due to the claimants respectively. The reason for this, he indicates, is that the increase of rental value from causes other than goodwill would in one case be £100, and in the other case £200 per annum, so that the deduction on this account would be only half in the first case of what it would be in the second.

The explanation is that in the case of the long leaseholder, the tenant, in paying a rent of £100, was paying only one-half of what the property was worth when the second man took up his lease at the rent of £200.

In the Typical Valuation, under the heading of "Benefit due "to other causes," the first item is worded "Lease Rent." I think it would have been better to call it "Lease Rental Value," and to have taken the rental value at the time when the goodwill began to be created.

For the purposes of the Act this rental value should be taken at a time, at least five years, and not exceeding fourteen years previous to the end of the tenancy. The five years is the minimum term for the creation of goodwill, and the fourteen years may conveniently be taken as a maximum, being not only a good average figure for a lease but also the maximum term fixed by the Act for the new lease, which is granted with the object of enabling the tenant to work out his goodwill.

Assume therefore in the case cited by Mr. Merlin that fifteen years ago, when the lease of the second shop was granted, the rental value of the long leaseholder's shop was the same as that of the neighbour's, viz., £200 per annum ; then he should have debited his profit and loss account with a rental of £200 per annum instead of £100. True, he was only paying £100 to his landlord, but he was enjoying the balance himself, and in fact putting it in his own pocket. The soundness of this principle is shown by the fact that had he during his term been desirous of selling his business, while possessing a lease at less than market rent, he would have taken care to charge the full market rent against his profits, and in addition to the price asked for the business he would have sold his lease with its margin of rental value as a better security and probably at a larger number of years' purchase than he could get for his business profits. If the businesses were charged with the proper rental values in this way, the disparity between the amounts of the rent due to other causes would disappear, and the compensations would be assessed upon a consistent basis.

The last actual query which was raised at the meeting was voiced by Mr. Bull. That gentleman referred to the Typical Valuation, and asked with reference to the method of arriving at the years' purchase of the adherent goodwill (as set out in the right-hand top corner) whether the mathematical multiplier and the first adjustment do not overlap each other in that they both appear, from the text of the Paper, to allow for duration and for the appropriate rate of interest.

This is, of course, a very pertinent question. My answer is that they do not overlap, but that they are complementary to each other. It is their combined effect which produces the required result in the ascertainment of the proper years' purchase. The principle of their combination is to adopt a fixed years' purchase which would represent the value of an "average good "business," and to furnish a sliding scale which would permit of adjustment for current variation.

The standard adopted is the three years' purchase of an "ordinary profit," corresponding (on the basis of fourteen years' duration and 15 per cent. interest) to 3·95 years' purchase of the "true profit." As long as the "ordinary profit" continues to command three years' purchase, so long will the "true profit" command 3·95 years' purchase.

But if the current price of the "ordinary profit" should for any reason rise or fall, the years' purchase of the "true profit" will rise or fall in the same proportion. The point to be observed is that the rise or fall in value is being caused by an alteration in the factors of duration and interest (and possibly other considerations), and that it is this alteration only which is measured by the variation in current price.

Hence, the operation of the sliding scale, which I have called the "first adjustment," and which allows for this variation, does not overlap that of the "mathematical multiplier."

I hope this will meet Mr. Bull's difficulty, and I apologise to him, and to my other auditors, for any lack of clearness in my attempted explanation of a rather difficult subject.

Nevertheless, Mr. Bull's challenge to the combination of the mathematical multiplier and its adjustment must be acknowledged to the extent of admitting that it is intended only to serve as a contrivance for obtaining an approximation of value; an outline, indicating the principles to be considered by the surveyor, and within which may be constructed his own valuation in accordance with the conditions with which he has to deal.

By means of this contrivance it is possible to combine three processes: To change the years' purchase of the ordinary profit into the years' purchase of the true profit ; to allow for variations of current price in respect of the same business ; and to allow for differences of price in businesses of different classes.

In view of the somewhat cumbersome appearance of the method, it has been suggested that it is unnecessarily complicated, and that the appropriate years' purchase might be arrived at directly from the current price by reducing the "ordinary "profit" to true profit, and by increasing the years' purchase accordingly, as for an improved class of security. There is no reason why surveyors should not adopt this short cut, provided that they take cognisance of the principles on which the Typical Valuation is based ; but I think it will be found that in so doing there is involved a calculation somewhat akin to that employed in the method shown. Should, however, there be special features, as to duration or rate of interest, the use of Table II., with its mathematical multiplier and adjustment, may prove essential.

In any case it should be clearly understood that no claim is made that the method is absolute, either in universal application or in complete accuracy. Indeed, no method which involved so many factors depending on private judgment and other variable conditions could be absolutely accurate. The method, admittedly, has its valnerable points, but, on the other hand, it possesses many conveniences, as for instance:—

It provides, in the mathematical multiplier, a fixed standard for comparison.

It furnishes in the sliding scale of the current price a means of including variations from all sources.

It also steadies the calculation, and helps to eliminate guesswork.

It regularises the transformation of ordinary profit into true profit.

It may obviate the necessity of assessing separately the difficult factors of duration and interest.

It is correct for the figures given, and approximately correct for average cases.

It is capable of adaptation to unusual cases.

It provides a check on calculations conducted on other lines.

Its retention and use therefore are recommended as a practical way of arriving at a just estimate of value.

With regard to Mr. Bull's final point, as to the propriety of using gross profit rather than net profit as the basis of valuation, I have always considered that, owing to the wide variation between the overhead expenses of different businesses, net profit should be the test of value, and the calculations in the Paper are accordingly based on net profit.

Upon the vital question as to whether the increased rent due to causes other than goodwill should be valued upon a basis of perpetuity or of the duration of the tenant's influence, I was gratified to find that, although expert opinion was divided on the subject, the objections of those who favour the theory of perpetuity, and who therefore look askance as the Typical Valuation, centre chiefly round the legal interpretation of certain somewhat obscure phrases in the Act.

The argument as to fair dealing between landlord and tenant was not assailed, and I am therefore hopeful that, notwithstanding some lack of certitude on that particular point, the method suggested in the Paper may be found to fulfil, as nearly as is possible in so complex a matter, the object of the Act.

It now only remains for me to say how highly I appreciate the honour which was accorded to me by The Chartered Surveyors' Institution of addressing my fellow surveyors, and to offer the Council my thanks therefor and for their friendly hospitality.

I thank the mover and seconder of the vote of thanks, particularly for the delicate compliment paid by Mr. Bedells in his desire "for more." My audience also are entitled to receive acknowledgment of their courteous and patient hearing of a technical and somewhat indigestible Paper upon a subject of which the difficulty, as well as the interest, furnished some excuse for its delivery.

A DISCUSSION took place on Mr. W. H. Scanlan's Paper entitled

RECENT DEVELOPMENT IN DOMESTIC DRAINAGE AND SANITATION.

Mr. Christopher Chart (Member of Council) said it was his pleasant duty to propose that a hearty vote of thanks be awarded to Mr. Scanlan for the Paper which he had introduced to the members in the speech which he had just made.

As the author pointed out in his opening remarks, the science of sanitation must be progressive, but it had been slow, partly because unrestricted experiments could not be made in matters which so deeply affected the health and well-being of the community ; partly because of restrictions imposed by by-laws ; and partly because certain main principles had been fairly well established at the time Mr. Blake read his Paper, and progress and development since then must have been mainly in matters of detail, and, therefore, necessarily slow.

All members would agree with the plea for uniformity in by-laws. It was highly illogical that what was permitted in one district should be forbidden in another. But personally he did not think that on the whole those anomalies acted to the hindrance of progress, because, as the author pointed out, there was a large number of authorities which made by-laws, and if one waited until all those authorities were convinced that the one-pipe system was such as could be introduced safely, one might have to wait indefinitely before The Institution could hear any Paper on the subject. A notable ecclesiastic in a speech which he had made recently had referred to the "English characteristics of preferring "arrangements which, on the whole, worked well to logical pre-"cision of function." Personally he thought that was what people did in this country.

The question whether the intercepting trap between the house drain and the public sewer should be compulsory, permissive or prohibited had long been a vexed question, and had been considered by a Departmental Committee of the old Local Government Board, now the Ministry of Health, and a very inconclusive report was issued by that Committee as long ago as 1912, so that it could hardly be called a recent development. On the whole he was inclined to agree with the author; he did not consider that its advantages warranted its use. It undoubtedly necessitated a second ventilator in the simplest of house drains (although the Departmental Committee had not thought so) which was customarily provided for by the fresh-air inlet. He did not agree with the author in condemning the practice of carrying up the fresh-air inlet to the same height as the soil-pipe and omitting the mica-flap box, because if one watched the behaviour of the mica flap, one saw that that ventilator acted in different ways according to the flow of the sewage which was passing down the drain; when one got a strong flow going down the drain the ventilator near the interceptor undoubtedly acted as an outlet and not as an inlet.

Turning to the one-pipe system which the author described as the most recent of far-reaching developments in sanitary installation, and which, no doubt, was the subject which he really wanted the members to discuss that night, he personally did not see—nor did the author claim—that any new principle was involved, or anything which could be hailed as a new discovery. The underlying theory on which it was based had been common to sanitary practice for a good many years, namely, that inasmuch as the contents of a drain or sewer, and the gases which arose from them, were objectionable and harmful, they should be rigorously excluded from the habitation of men. Consequently the old practice had been that drains were invariably kept outside the building. If they had to be inside, or run under the buildings, then they should be protected ; and under no circumstances whatever, except in the case of a w.c. or a slop-sink, should any direct connection between the fittings and the drain be permitted inside the house. So that all waste-pipes had been made to discharge over external-trapped gulleys, not, as he thought the author had suggested, that the gulleys should act so as to exclude solids, but really to provide aerial disconnection between the drains outside the building and the fittings inside the house. It was quite true that it had been the practice to fix sink-wastes without traps outside London, but where modern by-laws were enforced that was no longer allowed. The odours which had arisen from the untrapped drain had given rise to the practice of providing the external channel leading to the gulley, but it had been soon found that the external channel leading to the gulley had not been a cure for the evils which it had been designed to prevent, and that the evils had really arisen from the foul condition of the waste-pipe. Consequently it was the common practice now—and in his own experience it was compulsory in most of the by-laws outside London—to insist that all waste-pipes should be trapped.

In theory he could see no objection to the one-pipe system provided that it was properly designed and executed as described by the author. He did doubt, however, whether it should be left to the " qualified craftsman " to calculate the relative sizes of the pipes ; but perhaps the author did not mean that this should be left to the plumber who wiped the joints.

He cordially agreed that æsthetically a multitude of pipes disfigured the fair face of a building, but he wondered how far that demand would take them. Would they find, when the one-pipe system had been tried out and tested, that progress in plumbing practice had become so advanced that it was no longer desirable in the interests of " safety-first " to keep one pipe outside the building, and that, for æsthetic reasons, they must mask all their pipes by carrying them inside? He was afraid he was a little bit conservative, but at present he doubted if the advantages of the lower cost and the lesser number of pipes outweighed the added risk of additional fittings directly connected to the drains inside the house.

He did not doubt that in the few new buildings in London which had been drained on this system, and where the design and workmanship and supervision had been of the very best, it was functioning satisfactorily to-day ; but it remained to be seen whether it would stand the test of time. It was an indisputable fact that from time to time defects did develop in the best and most permanent materials put together with the utmost care. Mr. Scanlan, in his note on page 169, referred to the dangers which existed of the breaking of the joint between the w.c. and the soil-pipe. Expansion and contraction might account for some of those defects. Settlements, and the constant vibration to which buildings were subject in large towns or near main traffic routes, and which increased as the buildings were carried higher, were other contributory causes. Further, the alterations in user, which the members know did occur as buildings grew older, did lead to the fittings becoming disused, and if those were in direct communication with the drain, and the water in the trap was evaporated, there was a potential source of danger. In large institutions, where expert and regular inspection was part of the routine, such risks were very largely eliminated, but he viewed with some apprehension the general adoption of this system as part of the usual practice. He was convinced that it would throw more work on the district surveyors and building inspectors who had to supervise the work of drainage, and if they were to have even a few defects occurring as a result of the general adoption of that system, he thought they would then have a repercussion in the appointment of a large number of inspectors to make house-to-house inspections in order to see what defects had developed ; and if there was one thing which was distasteful to the Englishman who looked on his house as his castle it was anything in the nature of a house-to-house inspection.

With regard to the saving effected in costs, he would like to have seen some detailed figures, but he knew that they might be misleading unless very full details were supplied. He recognised that the saving might be appreciable where the number of fittings proportionate to the size of the building was a very high one, but he was less certain when it came to the sanitary work of a small private house.

There was one point on which he would like some information. The author had referred to the types of traps which were now on the market designed to resist siphonage without the fitting of an anti-siphonage-pipe, and stated that he had not found some of them satisfactory in practice. Personally he would like to know whether Mr. Scanlan's objection was to the unventilated branch only, or in what direction he had found them inefficient.

He congratulated Mr. Scanlan upon having given a Paper which should provoke a useful discussion, and he had much pleasure in moving a very hearty vote of thanks to him.

Lieut.-Colonel S. H. Page, c.m.g. (Fellow), said he was very glad to be allowed to have the opportunity of seconding the vote of thanks to the author, because lectures on sanitary science, as Mr. Chart had just said, were so rare as to become almost milestones.

He felt that the Paper dealt chiefly with the matter of a congested area ; but he rather took the view that one had to look at sanitary science on wider lines than that.

He had been sorry to note Mr. Scanlan's attitude to intercepting traps. Personally he realised the advantage, from the local authority official's point of view, of the omission of the intercepting trap, but from the private owner's it was to be deplored, except perhaps in a congested area, which was a different matter. He did not suggest that the water seal of an intercepting trap was an impenetrable bar to gas ; he knew it was not from a permeation of a water seal point of view ; but at the same time all during the day there was fresh liquid going into that trap, and, therefore, the danger of permeation was absolutely gone. The danger existed only at night, or at such times when the trap was more or less stagnant, but even in that case it was one's own fault if one had not provided proper movement of air through the drains in the way of ventilation. If that were provided, the slight amount of danger which might arise from permeation of the water seal was negligible. Personally he viewed the idea of the omission of the intercepting trap as a retrograde step. For one thing he wondered how many people realised the great advantage it was in sectionising the ventilation. He had systems under his own control in which he had purposely put in three extra traps in order to sectionise his ventilation, and if one tested those with an anemometer and examined the air one would be surprised at the great improvement which had occurred in the drain air itself. He had seen that great improvement in many cases since he had sectionised that ventilation and had ensured a real and thorough movement of air in all his drains and pipes.

If one got obstruction through an intercepter trap it was surely a tacit admission of incompetence in design and execution. He had had a recent example in a house where money had been no object. He had found there a 6-in. intercepter which held two and a half times the bulk of water of a 4-in. intercepter. He had found in the intercepting chamber that the channel leading into the intercepter had got a sharp bend immediately as it turned into the intercepter, with the consequence that every flow had immediately made a whirlpool action in the trap of the intercepter instead of flushing it through.

One point which the author had made had been the liability of the stopper of the intercepting trap to come out. If one allowed one's builder to take any old intercepting trap which he bought cheap and to put it in the job, of course it would come out ; but there were traps and fittings on the market which were absolutely reliable.

With regard to the one-pipe system he agreed absolutely that it was a system for congested areas only. He did not think that the one-pipe system was applicable at the present day to the ordinary conditions which prevailed in the country. From an æsthetic point of view it had much to commend it, but from the practical point of view the one-pipe system must be carefully designed on the drawing board, the operative must be skilled in knowing the principles to be arrived at and sufficiently trust worthy to carry out the design. That was all right in a place like the metropolis or in any big city, but what about the ordinary conditions one met with, where the lady of the house suddenly thought she would like a lavatory basin moved 5 feet further away, and sent for the local plumber without calling in anybody to advise her—the sort of thing that was happening every day everywhere?

The great disadvantage of the one-pipe system was the ambiguity of its ventilation. It emphasised the point which seemed to be predominant to-day, namely, that the vent pipe was either to permit expansion of air or to allow access of air to prevent a vacuum. That was totally different from his own view and his own experience. His own experience was that unless one could get a column of air moving continually along the pipe, one would not get a clean sweet drainage. He spoke feelingly on that matter because until he had designed his system so that he had got movement of air continually along his drains he had always been having trouble.

He knew that drainage ventilation was generally disregarded for the reason that the majority of people did not realise its importance, that was to say, the movement of air. Those people who did so suddenly realised the great difficulty of achieving it, and were then rather apt to leave it to comply with the by-laws because that was an easy way out of the difficulty.

With regard to the difficulty of the fresh-air inlet being taken up to the top of the house, one was losing the siphonic action which always used to be considered essential with a low inlet and a high exhaust, but there really was no difficulty about it. One had only to put a down-blow cowl on the inlet and leave the top of the vent-pipe well exposed or put an exhaust cowl on it. If one tested it then with an anemometer, one would be surprised at the amount of air which was getting round, and it would keep the drains and vent-pipes free from foul air. He had used them purposely, and he had never known any trouble in their use.

One point which had rather staggered him was the suggested size of traps. It was suggested that a 1-in. pipe required a 3-in. seal, whereas a little further down in the Paper he saw that a w.c. trap required a 1¾-in. seal. He understood that that was now to be amended to 2in. He had carried out a lot of experiments both with regard to drainage, ventilation and permeation water seals. Those experiments had been going on for about forty years at odd times. There was one factor which seemed to stand out from those experiments and which certainly had impressed itself on him, namely, that the length of time which it took to permeate a water seal was in accordance with the square of the depth of the seal ; that was to say, if a 2-in. seal took four hours, a 3-in. seal would take nine hours. Another point was that the larger the surface of the water exposed to the contaminating gas in relation to the depth of the seal, the sooner and the more effective it would be in giving off the permeated gas on the other side. It astonished him to hear that a w.c. required only a 1¾-in. seal, whilst a lavatory basin required a 3-in. seal—a w.c. with a large water surface and a lavatory basin with a small water surface.

One point he noticed in the Paper was the remark that water-closets were generally made to comply with the by-laws and thereby relieved professional men of all responsibility. He hoped the author did not quite mean that sentence as it read, because he did hope that they had not yet arrived at that stage when they were content to sit down under model by-laws which had been drafted fifty years ago and consider themselves as professional men relieved of the responsibility of looking after their clients' fittings with some amount of intelligence.

The ordinary average chamber cover, to deal with another point, had a seal which was supposed to be either sealed by water or grease—generally by grease. But what happened? It was greased down to start with. Then a labourer came along and looked to see if the drain was clean. He picked it up and the grease with it and put it on the ground by his side. Half the grease laid on the earth. The man put the lid back minus at least 50 per cent. of the grease. Therefore the air-tight chamber cover was dependent on its water seal, and on that only. Taking the lid, it would be found that in 80 per cent. of the lids there was not a projection of ¾in. forming the seal. It was quite an exception to come across a 1-in. dip. The other day he had actually come across a case where there had been less than ¼in. effective seal owing to the fact that there had been an original ½in., and then they had put a little casting at the corner in order to strengthen it. He asked the members to think over that point and to take an ordinary case. They insisted on at least a 1¾-in. seal for their gully out in the open air. Then they connected that branch to a chamber, which they promptly covered with a lid which had got less than ¾-in. seal to it. It was merely because people did not think. That was the trouble in connection with sanitary science to-day—that people did not think in small detail, and it was the small detail which was absolutely vital in sanitation.

He was glad to hear that sink traps were now to be compulsory. He quite agreed that in some districts it was actually stated that if the waste did not exceed 6 feet the trap might be omitted. Never was there a more pernicious idea than that. One had only to put one's fingers round the inside of the waste and then put them to one's nose to realise the fallacy.

He heartily agreed as to the undesirability of perforated circular holes for overflows of lavatory basins. But what about the bath overflow? The author had not mentioned that. Personally he had yet to find a decent bath overflow. He did not know of a bath constructed anywhere and on the market at the present time which he could consider to be really thoroughly sanitary.

Again referring to baths, Mr. Scanlan had referred to the enclosures. Were we progressing? Wooden enclosures had been done away with, but wooden enclosues had at least had access doors by which one could get at the traps. They seemed to have passed through a state of nudity and now to have started to clothe again—with panels of enamelled iron, patent glass, artificial marble, and "real" marble, but how many accesses to traps could one find? The only way to get at them was to unscrew and take down the whole panel.

He agreed with the condemnation of the average w.c. joint. New houses were being put up by the hundred. What happened was that a w.c. pan was put on a first floor and connected into an iron socket built into the wall. The wood was unseasoned and shrank in the first three months at least ⅛in. taking the pan with it, and bang went the joint. He agreed that there should be some method of making a flexible joint. Personally he always insisted on a short length of lead.

There were many other points which he would like to discuss, and he could go on for a considerable time, but he would not detain the meeting further.

Dr. Charles Porter (Medical Officer of Health for St. Marylebone) (Visitor) expressed surprise at the more or less definite dislike of the two previous speakers to the one-pipe idea. In his view, in spite of all that they had said, the system had come to stay. An innovation so far as older members of the profession like Colonel Page were concerned, to those entering now it was no more a novelty than any other system. Beginning with it, they would go on with the one-pipe system, and, as time went on, he was certain they would see further modifications of the one-pipe system. In spite of all that had been said, the one-pipe system had been thoroughly tested, not here, of course, but in great cities all over the United States—New York, Chicago, Boston, and the great cities in the West, where there was nothing but the one-pipe system—it had been submitted to test. Colonel Page had said that the one-pipe system was suitable only for congested areas like London. Why he was totally at a loss to understand, nor could he see why Colonel Page should condemn a congested area to something which he considered to be essentially bad. The difficulty with the English was that they never experimented in the matter of sanitation ; they let other nations do the experimenting for them, and then they stepped in and claimed what had been done as their own, though, of course, certain of them condemned it.

Discussing modifications of the system, Dr. PORTER described systems seen in Germany, and showed that practice there had advanced even beyond the one-pipe system, which the London County Council, in its wisdom, had now adopted. Germany had a real one-pipe or, better still, " single-pipe " system, in which the soil-pipe above was relied upon, all accessory ventilators in the form of anti-siphonage-pipes to traps being done away with.

Commenting upon Mr. Scanlan's references to the draft by-laws of the London County Council, Dr. PORTER expressed the opinion that the great trouble with by-laws, as with traps, was that they were obstructive. Traps were purely obstructive, and ventilation was introduced into drains in many cases largely because the trapping was badly done and led to obstruction. Frequently, he believed, designers of drainage systems in order to modify the effect produced by injurious trapping were compelled to introduce something else in the shape of ventilation. In the case of by-laws he recognised that it was essential that there should be some sort of guide provided for the person who was going to carry out the work. He agreed with Mr. Scanlan that uniformity in the instructions was necessary. At the same time, however, he thought it right to point out that uniformity was not without objections. It was a sterilising influence, and practically progress was impossible where there was uniformity. No opportunity at all was allowed for experiment ; no opportunity at all was allowed for the application of initiative, and unless initiative was permitted and encouraged in regard to sanitation, as in other things, they simply stood still.

Even in the draft by-laws of the London County Council no provision was made for experimentation, for the exercise of initiative, and the making of progress. The clauses relating to the one-pipe system, no one could possibly deny, were excellent, and provided an admirable guide to any person who desired to adopt the system. As by-laws in fact they could not be better, but they had the objection that they were obstructive, since if they were absolutely obeyed and slavishly followed, as presumably they must be, under them there would be no advance. There would not be the opportunity, for example, to test out whether or not the German system was right, and whether or not there really could be complete and hygienic satisfaction with the single-pipe system, an arrangement in which there was simply a soil-pipe acting not only as the sole receiver of all discharges, but as the sole ventilator of all the traps of all the appliances connected with it also.

No doubt Colonel Page, who had ideas as to the necessity for clean fresh air in drains, and Mr. Swinson, who was an authority on by-laws, would be horrified if they went into a block of modern flats in Berlin. In each bathroom in each flat they would find that the bath was entirely and freely movable so that the housewife could get behind it and clean behind and all round it. They would also find that the waste-pipe from the bath was a very short-length-pipe discharging over its trap, or what, in effect, was a small trapped gulley with a grating in the floor of the bathroom. Not only was that system found in thousands of flats in Berlin, but also in institutions such as hospitals ; and even the most modern there and elsewhere throughout Germany, Holland and Denmark the usual arrangement was that described—a soil-pipe and nothing but a soil-pipe into which the bath, the lavatory-basin and the water closet all discharged, and in which there was no provision for ventilation other than the open soil-pipe. And it worked admirably and quite satisfactorily.

In America, he thought it right to mention, sanitarians still were keen on the anti-siphonage-pipe and on the ventilation of each one of the traps. It was not unlikely, however, since there they did experiment, that in time America would follow the German system. He was hopeful that, at some not too distant date, even in this country it would be followed. Himself he had ideas in connection with experiments along similar lines, and might some time or the other produce a report on the subject.

When he had read through Mr. Scanlan's Paper and had seen the references to intercepting traps, he knew there would be speakers who would have much to say with regard to those appliances. The time for talk about those things, however, was past, and in the matter of sanitation what he ought to be giving attention to was the one-pipe and such like systems, with a view to discovering how further they might simplify sanitary arrangements in order particularly to lessen the cost in connection with housing and rehousing schemes.

In conclusion Dr. PORTER complimented Mr. Scanlan on his Paper, and expressed his great pleasure at being present and being allowed to take part in the discussion.

Mr. E. T. SWINSON (Visitor) said that the present revision of the by-laws was a revision of the code approved in 1930. It consisted, in the main, of alterations due to the installation of the one-pipe system, the principal exception being that the new by-laws would provide for the use of galvanised iron pipes for soil-pipes as distinct from the current code of by-laws.

The principal points to be observed, so far as the revised code was concerned in connection with the one-pipe system of drainage, could be wrapped up in a few paragraphs: first of all, the construction of a pipe system of a standard equal to that of soil-pipes ; secondly, the provision of traps (deep sealed traps on small pipes in particular) so as to obtain the greatest resistance possible to unsealing ; and thirdly, insistence upon the ventilation of every trap upon the system. He thought that summarised the revised code of by-laws.

To come to the Paper itself, he desired particularly to refer to the foot-notes to the Model By-laws dealing with the question of the construction of pipes, &c. In dealing with those foot-notes he (Mr. Swinson) wanted notice taken of the fact that the only suggestion of the Minister of Health was that in administering the group of by-laws the Council would accept the specifications issued by the British Standards Institution and might challenge materials not complying with those specifications. Similarly, in connection with the making of joints, they would accept the methods recommended by the Institute of Plumbers in their specification but might challenge any other method. It would be noticed that the Minister of Health did not suggest that they should be definitely incorporated in the by-laws ; and inasmuch as foot-notes or marginal notes did not form a portion of the by-laws, it could be seen that the mere inclusion of such foot-notes would not carry one very much farther so far as insistence upon a certain form of construction was concerned.

There was a great difference between the practice out of London and practice in London. Dr. Porter had referred to the question of uniformity and had said that he was not a great believer in uniformity. That might be a good standpoint if one could depend upon a general universality of talent; but when one remembered that in London one was dealing with no less than 28 different authorities, with many hundreds of officials, one saw that it was most difficult to obtain an interpretation of a by-law in a common-sense way. Experience led to the conclusion that if the by-laws or the requirements were to be interpreted as they were intended to be interpreted, then they must be drawn up with as much detail as possible within the range of reason.

Then he desired to refer to the author's statement that an intercepting trap might be necessary if offensive gases were usually present in sewers. All too frequently considerable nuisance was experienced from ground-level ventilators on old sewers; and it was not unknown in modern sewers. Therefore, without expressing any opinion upon the advisability or the non-advisability of using intercepting traps, he did not wish those present to run away with the idea that Mr. Scanlan actually meant to infer that offensive gases were not usually present in sewers.

Mr. Scanlan stated: "In the light of recent developments "the soil waste-pipes may now be called drains." In passing he (Mr. Swinson) would like to say that legally all pipes, including rain-water pipes communicating with a sewer, were drains. That was an interpretation based upon law and supported by leading cases. He did not want the members to be under any misapprehension as to what was meant by that particular paragraph.

Reference was made to the advance in plumbing—the one-pipe system—and Mr. Scanlan stated: "On consideration, how-"ever, one fails to understand why the principle has not been "accepted before." The one-pipe system, however, was not by any means new. Those who had had experience of sanitation dating back forty or more years could recall that it was common practice in those early days. The materials, however, then used, and the methods adopted in the construction of drains, soil-pipes and waste-pipes were of a low standard, and to that circumstance was due in no small measure the adoption of the dual or two-pipe system. Improved methods of construction, however, and the availability of better materials, coupled with a recognition of how to avoid the defects of the old one-pipe system, justified, in his opinion, a reversion to the one-pipe system with perfect safety.

He saw that Mr. Scanlan had a tilt at the question of puff-pipes. He himself agreed that in many circumstances puff-pipes were objectionable, but there was no question that puff-pipes could be quite satisfactory if the open ends were so situated as to avoid nuisance.

There was a slight mistake in the statement " In the London " County Council area and some of the larger cities ventilating " pipes must now be fitted to the waste-pipe system, with " branches to the trap of each fitting." That was not quite correct, because so far as waste-pipe fitments were concerned, and the traps attached thereto, trap ventilating pipes were compulsory only where necessary to preserve the water seal of the traps. That applied to construction on the dual or the two-pipe system. There should be no misunderstanding about it. If the one-pipe system was in question, then trap ventilation would be essential in every case.

Referring to the question of ventilation of traps, the statement was made that until experience was gained it was advisable to vent each branch, and that this should include those to fittings on the top floor. So far as the one-pipe system was concerned, he thought ventilation of every trap must be considered absolutely essential, and that applied to the traps on the top floor as well as to those on other floors, because they were subject to unsealing very much in the same manner. That was why he would, with all respect, take exception to the author's diagram (No. 1). He suggested that the arrangement shown for the first and third floors should not be accepted. It would not be accepted under the proposed by-laws. The proper method was that shown on the second floor and that in diagram No. 2, where the ventilation of each trap was provided for.

Another point to which the author referred was the question of fresh-air inlets. There was no question of fresh-air inlets in the revised code of by-laws which was in any respect different from those now obtaining ; but the author raised the question—and it had also been raised by one of the speakers—of equal atmospheric pressure occurring in each vertical pipe of similar height. It was extremely doubtful whether any emphasis need be laid on the question of equal atmospheric pressure in pipes of identical height, particularly in view of differing environmental conditions and the air movements set up by discharges from fitments. If any justification was needed for the abolition of the low down fresh-air inlet and the substitution of a pipe carried up to a position where it could discharge foul air without offence, it was to be seen in thousands of cases throughout London where so-called fresh-air inlets were stuck either against entrance doors or underneath a bay or other window, giving an opportunity for drain, and in some cases sewer, air to enter the buildings.

The author had said: "The water test is the most stringent for

" horizontal drains, and whilst it may be unfair in the case of old " drains if too large a head of water is used, newly laid drains " should withstand this test." His comment on that was that maintenance in a water-tight condition was surely necessary whether the drain was new or old.

In dealing with water storage and supplies, the author made the comment: " The Water Board make regulations for the " storage of water in supply cisterns, but there are no by-laws " providing for the protection of these against contamination " and becoming the receptacle for dirt and often filth." He thought Mr. Scanlan must have overlooked the fact that in London the duty was laid upon the sanitary authority by Section 50 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, to make by-laws for securing the cleanliness and freedom from pollution of " tanks, cisterns, and other receptacles for storing water.

Mr. Bernard Briant (Fellow) said that the supplementary remarks of the author and the speech of Dr. Charles Porter (who had had the one-pipe system under his supervision in Cumberland House, Marble Arch, and therefore was one of the very few men in London who could speak with any authority on the subject) had rather taken the wind out of his sails, except that he thought it would be a great pity for The Institution to bless the one-pipe system without going more into the details of its cost. He was glad to hear that there was to be no immediate obligation to adopt such a system, and in any case he thought it would not generally apply to buildings in which the members of The Institution were interested. The people who advocated the one-pipe system were all out for simplification, which, of course, implied a saving in cost. The one-pipe system would involve not only special planning of the building and grouping the pipes, but also first-class workmanship. There would have to be loop ventilation, which made the one-pipe into at least two-pipes. It would also involve deep sealed traps and larger main and ventilating stacks, probably in copper, and generally inside the building; and, presumably also, the usual gulleys and pipes to take the rain water. Therefore he thought The Chartered Surveyors' Institution was quite right in demanding to know more about the question of cost, and that Dr. Porter was right when he said that the methods of the Germans, rather than the Americans, should be studied for sufficiently good sanitation combined with economy.

On the question of the intercepting trap, he supposed it was quite distinct from the one-pipe system, which did not mean necessarily the abolition of the intercepting trap. Reference had been made by Mr. Scanlan to the Report of the Departmental Committee in 1912. Nothing he could say about the intercepting trap would carry so much weight as to quote what the Departmental Committee had said on that question. They said:—

" 125. The disadvantages involved by the use of the inter-" cepting trap are substantial and of serious practical importance, " and as the most important of the effects of these disadvantages " are concealed from view, they may remain in existence, quite " unknown to the householder. The objectionable features of the " fresh-air inlet may be overcome apparently without detriment " by omitting this contrivance altogether. The only ' ventila-" ' tion ' which appears to be required on a house drain, apart " from anti-syphonage-pipes, is that which should be provided " by an opening at the top of each soil-pipe.

" The liability of the trap to become blocked appears to be " insuperable. The accumulation of sewage in the drain produced " by the block, and from which many undesirable consequences " may follow, is not usually evident with ordinary use of the " drain and therefore may long remain undiscovered. This " unsuspected blocking and accumulation of sewage appears to " be very common, evidence of it having been found in more than " 23 per cent. of 5,600 traps, which were specially examined.

" 131. Chemical evidence shows the most frequent character-" istic of sewer air is the presence of smell due to certain volatile " substances, given off from sewage, in such minute quantities " as to be harmless in themselves. The smell of sewer air is only " very exceptionally due to sulphuretted hydrogen, contrary to " what has been supposed, and this dangerous gas is, usually, " not present, even in minute traces, in the air of sewers.

" 132. The bacteriological evidence shows that micro-organisms " of sewage origin are very rarely present in sewer air. On the " other hand they may be present in drain air in large numbers. " This evidence undoubtedly indicates that the bacterial danger " of sewer air is incomparably less than the bacterial danger of " drain air ; and that, therefore, the entry of sewer air, into a " house, is of correspondingly smaller importance, bacterially, " than the entry of drain air. The necessity of the intercepting " trap on bacteriological or epidemiological grounds, has not " therefore been established."

The intercepting trap, as far as he could trace its history, dated from about 1890, and therefore had a legitimate run for about twenty years before the Committee's Report. Then the War came, and the profession had been so obsessed with other things that they had forgotten all about it, and were still putting in intercepting traps and mica-flap valves as a matter of course although local authorities had power under the Model By-laws to relieve one of the interceptor. One good thing an interceptor might do was to make it more difficult for rats to get into a building through a defect in a drain, but the authorities could hardly say this was an advantage.

He would like to have heard Dr. Porter comment on the question of hopper heads. The other day he (Mr. Briant) had put in a bath on the first floor, and had to run a waste stack from the basement to the roof for that one branch from the bath when all the time there was a hopper head within a few feet. There was in most cases nothing wrong with the hopper head in his opinion.

He desired to put in a plea for the valve closet. It had always seemed to him that the effects on health of a valve closet might be more far-reaching than was thought, for the reason that it was surely a natural thing, especially when anyone was not quite well, to see the excreta and to be warned if there was anything to be afraid of or the reverse. There was no sanitary objection to a valve closet, and, properly looked after, the mechanical parts lasted many years, but it was difficult to find a plumber now who knew sufficient about a valve closet.

With regard to lavatory basins, the best now had, as they always should have had, a little flat space on which to stand a glass as well as soap, &c. This should also be done in the case of sinks and baths.

The best overflow he had come across from the point of view of cleanliness in baths was the hollow-metal cylinder which formed a combined plug and overflow.

With reference to drinking water, the Metropolitan Water Board and other similar bodies had all sorts of regulations about cisterns and so on, and tried to prevent people from connecting a cold-water tap over a bath direct off the main. Everyone knew that if one wanted a drink of cold water when upstairs one was not likely in small households to get anyone downstairs to bring it up. Upstairs and over the bath there should always be a cold-water tap off the main, because there was more room to put a jug under a bath tap than under the tap in a wash basin.

The draining board could be moveable, but he agreed the joint between board and sink was a weak spot. He would like to see deeper channels in manholes to reduce fouling, and the outside of stoneware gulleys should be unglazed so as to form a key for the adhesion of cement.

Mr. H. G. Assiter (Chartered Surveyor) said that there had always been two schools of thought with regard to intercepting traps—one who wished to retain them and the other who said they were useless. The latter consisted usually of those who were interested from the local authority's side ; they wanted to use the house drains as an added means of ventilating the sewers, and those who were concerned chiefly with the domestic and house side always held that the drains should be intercepted from the sewer. He thought that the chief object of the intercepting trap was to keep sewer gases from the house drain, and, moreover, a sewer was more suitably ventilated in the contrary manner than a drain. It had been found by experiment that normally the passage of air in a sewer was downward; that was to say, it followed the course of the flow of the liquid in the sewer rather than upward, and it was also influenced by the direction of the wind ; but in times of heaviness of air the sewer gas was forced to the lower end of the sewer, so that if house drains were directly connected to a sewer, those in the lower part of the district would be very liable to have sewer gas forced into them.

With regard to the one-pipe system it appeared to him (Mr. Assiter) that, having got rid also of the intercepting trap, it laid open the sewer directly to the house drains, and, through the house drains, into the one pipe. In all well-appointed houses now it was customary to put in fitted lavatory basins with a proper waste and hot and cold water laid on, and Dr. Porter invited people to lay on sewer gas directly into their bedrooms and trust to the efficiency of a trap to keep it out. Personally he objected to such a procedure.

One of the advantages claimed for the one-pipe system was a saving in cost of installation. Bearing in mind what he had just said about the bedrooms, he did not think it was so advantageous in that respect, because with the one-pipe system there would have to be branches running all over the place. If the one-pipe system was going to pick up from the w.c.'s and the baths and the lavatory basins, he did not know where one was going to get to with it. And he certainly thought that a bedroom should be protected. The one-pipe system might be safe in large buildings where there would be adequate supervision and where the work would be done under the best conditions and everything made safe ; but what about all the thousands of little houses which were being put up all over the place? He would not care to leave the health of the people to the class of work which would be done in those houses with a one-pipe system.

The President then put the vote of thanks, which was carried by acclamation.

Mr. Scanlan promised to reply to the discussion in writing.

The following written reply has been received from Mr. SCANLAN:—

The discussion generally followed the lines I had anticipated, and clearly demonstrated that there is still a keen diversity of opinion on the relative merits of the dual system of soil and waste-pipes and the "one-pipe" method of drainage; further, that the intercepting trap still has its adherents.

With regard to the former the objections are theoretical, and not based on actual experience of the single-pipe system. The objections made were generally that it called for a higher standard of plumbing than is required at present. In this I do not agree; in fact the same methods as are required under existing by-laws are sufficient for this system. The essential difference is that greater care and skill is required in the lay-out; especially of the ventilating pipes. It is in this latter aspect that the knowledge of an expert is required, or if not an expert, then a person who fully appreciates the functions of the ventilating pipes. The new by-laws set out what is required, and if these are carefully followed, there is no reason to anticipate any trouble arising.

Mr. Chart questioned the saving of costs. There can be no doubt that the single-pipe system is the cheaper. He also asked why pipes should not be taken inside buildings. The objection to this is that pipes are not so accessible, and in the event of a defect serious damage may result. The dangers of evaporation, to which he referred, are similar no matter which system is used, and in any case the seal of a trap to a w.c. evaporates more quickly than that to a waste fitment.

Colonel Page apologised for the criticisms he felt impelled to make in regard to certain of my suggestions. The Paper was written with this especial object, and I appreciate the arguments he used for the retention of the intercepting trap, and agree that obstruction is frequently caused by inefficient design or a bad trap. This, however, confirms my view that some improvement is required. The Departmental Committee reported that the result of their inspections showed a large percentage (over 25 per cent.) were found to be obstructed. I cannot agree that the fresh-air inlet can be considered satisfactory for drains in towns.

His remarks as to the ventilating system accelerating the movement of air in the pipes are, of course, agreed.

I agree that a lead branch to the w.c. is a safeguard against defects arising from settlements. The question of bath wastes and overflows were omitted from the Paper, but are equally objectionable as in the case of lavatory basins.

The use of concrete manhole covers is to be deplored, as they do not provide a satisfactory seal.

There is little comment I can make on the pertinent remarks of Dr. Porter, for the reason that he generally agreed with my points of view, and gave us the benefit of the more advanced developments which are now being tested. My plea for uniformity of the by-laws was prompted by the lack of initiative on the part of some local authorities and not as a deterrent to future development.

Mr. Swinson's comments on my précis of the proposed by-laws must be accepted as correct, for the reason that he has the benefit of the lastest revisions, and I shall hope to deal with these at a later date in detail. The foot-notes referred to by me were copied from the Model By-laws, and were inserted to emphasise the points referred to.

I do not agree with his suggestion that galvanised piping is satisfactory for soil-pipes, for the reason that where these are cut the protecting surface is destroyed and corrosion is bound to occur. It was interesting to hear from him that puff-pipes are to be permitted in certain cases. I cannot accept his criticism of my drawing, as this satisfies the requirements of the proposed by-laws.

With regard to the comments of Mr. Briant on the one-pipe system and valve closets, I can only express surprise at the hesitation he indicated in accepting the progress in modern drainage systems and fittings.

The queries of Mr. Assiter are generally replied to above.

In conclusion I wish to express my thanks to the several gentlemen who took part in the discussion for their expressions of appreciation of my Paper.

Paper 554.

COMPENSATION AND BETTERMENT UNDER THE TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING ACT, 1932.

Papers by D. M. Lawrance, B.Sc. (Lond.) (Barrister-at-Law), and John A. Rosevear (Chartered Surveyor).

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Chartered Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 9th April, 1934.

1.—THE LEGAL ASPECT.

By D. M. Lawrance, B.Sc. (Lond.) (Barrister-at-Law).

Members of this Institution have already enjoyed the benefit of a detailed and excellent Memorandum on the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932.

It would, therefore, be superfluous, in this short Paper to attempt a word-for-word analysis of the provisions of the Act relating to compensation and betterment.

What it is hoped to do is to discuss in general terms how, and at what stages of a town planning scheme, those provisions may affect the legal rights of owners.

The Act provides for two distinct types of compensation:—

(i.) Compensation for injurious affection, and other loss, arising out of the provisions of a town planning scheme ;

(ii.) Compensation in respect of land compulsorily acquired under a scheme.

Compensation for Injurious Affection, &c.

On the question of compensation for injurious affection and other loss caused by a town planning scheme, the present Act is much more explicit than the Town Planning Act, 1925.

The latter merely stated briefly and baldly that anyone whose property was injuriously affected by the making of a town planning scheme might obtain compensation. The Act of 1932 is at pains to distinguish the different heads under which such claims may arise.

It is clear that a person may suffer loss under a scheme as soon as it comes into operation by reason of the restrictions it imposes on the development of his property.

On the other hand, the injury may not arise until some years later, when the responsible authority do some act, or carry out some work, in the process of enforcing the scheme.

Perhaps the most practical way of approaching this class of compensation, therefore, will be to consider the following five possible types of claim which appear to be contemplated by the Act:—

(1) Injurious affection due to the operation of some provision in a scheme ;

(2) Injurious affection caused by work done under a scheme ;

(3) Injurious affection due to an order for the preservation of a building of architectural or historic interest ;

(4) Damage caused in enforcing a scheme ;

(5) Claims arising out of the revocation or alteration of a scheme.

1. Injurious affection of property by the coming into operation of some provision in a Scheme.

An obvious example of this type of case is the coming into operation of some provision restriction the use of land. For instance, the reservation of land for main roads, public or private open spaces, or other purposes specified in the Act.

There is no power to restrict development in this way, and therefore no claim for compensation, until the scheme comes into operation. But the protection of the owner's rights in relation to compensation is a matter for practical consideration as far back as the date when the responsible authority's resolution to prepare or adopt a scheme is approved by the Minister of Health.

From that date, if an owner undertakes building operations or other development of his land without first applying to the responsible authority for their sanction of the proposed " interim development," he runs the risk of subsequently having his buildings or works altered or removed, or their use prohibited under the scheme, without any right to compensation.

When application is made for permission to develop, the responsible authority may refuse it, or may grant it subject to certain conditions. As a result, during the several years which may elapse between the approval of the resolution and the coming into operation of the scheme, the owner may, in effect, be prevented from developing his land in the most profitable manner.

The Town Planning Act, 1925, made no express provision for compensation for this loss. The new Act provides for such compensation, but in terms which require rather careful analysis.

In the first place it may be noted that when the responsible authority refuse permission to develop, or grant it subject to conditions, they may, if they think fit, make a contribution towards any damage or expense which the owner can show he is likely to suffer by reason of their decision. [Sec. 10 (4).]

If this contribution seems adequate, the owner may accept it. But it would seem that if he does so, he cannot afterwards complain that the actual loss involved has exceeded this sum.

The only method of safeguarding the owner's right to full compensation for loss suffered during the interim period is to appeal to the Minister of Health within twenty-eight days against the responsible authority's decision under the interim development order.

The Minister, in turn, may refuse permission to develop, or grant it subject to conditions, but in that case any loss suffered in consequence may be included in the claim for injurious affection when the scheme becomes operative. [Secs. 10 (5) and 18 (2).]

There is another possible advantage attaching to an appeal to the Minister. If he refuses permission to develop solely on the ground that the land ought to be reserved as a public open space, and is satisfied that, but for his decision, the proposed development would have taken place within a reasonable time, the owner may, within six months, require the responsible authority to purchase the land at a price to be fixed by agreement or under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919. [Sec. 10 (6).]

It is quite conceivable that the owner may, in some cases, regard this as the most satisfactory solution of the problem.

As regards the claim for injurious affection to be made when the scheme actually comes into operation, Section 18 makes it clear that compensation is only payable where property is injuriously affected by some provision in the scheme which infringes or curtails the owner's legal rights.

These words "infringes or curtails his legal rights" were not in the Act of 1925. They would seem to be significant. In the normal case, of course, when an owner is claiming in respect of restrictions imposed on his own land, there is no doubt about his legal rights being infringed or curtailed by the scheme. But suppose the scheme requires the reservation of A's land for some particular purpose—an aerodrome, for example: there will be no interference with the legal rights of the adjoining owner B, and yet public knowledge of the use to which the neighbouring land will eventually be put may quite conceivably affect the value of his property. In such a case there would appear to be no right to compensation.

Where a right to compensation is established, the basis of the claim is the amount by which the owner's property is decreased in value. Further, where any trade, business or profession has been carried on on the premises, the amount of resulting injury to that trade, business or profession may be included. [Sec. 18 (1).]

This latter provision is new, and has, no doubt, been inserted in view of the extension of town planning schemes to built-up areas, and the greater likelihood, in consequence, of such claims arising. As I read the clause, the right to claim for injury to any trade, business or profession, is dependent upon the owner first establishing the fact of injurious affection to the property on which the trade, &c., is carried on.

It has already been noted that the claim for injurious affection may also include additional injurious affection arising from restrictions on development imposed during the interim period. But only if these restrictions were imposed by the Ministry of Health on an appeal against the local authority's decision under an interim development order. [Sec. 18 (2).]

Presumably the claim for additional injurious affection may include any injury suffered by a trade, business or profession carried on on the land during the interim period.

The right to compensation for injurious affection conferred by Section 18 is modified by other sections of the Act.

As regards certain types of provision in a scheme, no right to compensation exists. As regards other types of provision, the right to compensation conferred by the Act may be expressly excluded by the terms of the scheme.

Section 20, re-enacting similar provisions contained in the Town Planning Act, 1925, provides that—(i.) If the same, or substantially the same, provision as one included in the scheme is in force under some other Act at the date when the scheme becomes operative, no compensation can be claimed under the Town and Country Planning Act.

For instance, if the reservation of land for street widening under the scheme is identical in effect with an "improvement line" under the Public Health Act, 1925, or a "building line" under the Roads Improvement Act, 1925.

This does not, of course, prejudice the owner's right to compensation (if any) under the Act already in operation. Both the Public Health Act, 1925, and the Roads Improvement Act, 1925, for example, provide compensation for injurious affection.

(ii.) If no similar provision to that contained in the scheme is actually in operation, but one might have been included under a scheme, order, regulation or by-law under some existing Act, then no greater compensation shall be payable under the scheme than the compensation (if any) which would have been payable under the existing Act.

The power to exclude the right to compensation for injurious affection in respect of certain types of provision in a scheme is given by Section 19. Mr. Rosevear discusses these provisions in detail in his Paper on "The practical "town planning aspect" of the compensation clauses.

2. Injurious affection of property by work done under a Scheme.

A typical case of this kind is where a responsible authority enters on land adjoining the site of a proposed new street for the purpose of executing incidental works, such as the construction of an embankment. The right to compensation arises as soon as the work is completed, and the claim must be made within twelve months.

As in the case of injurious affection caused by the coming into operation of a provision in the scheme, the basis of the claim will be the amount by which the owner's property is decreased in value, together with resulting injury to any trade or business or profession carried on on the property. [Sec. 18 (1).]

As in (1), it will be necessary to show that the work complained of infringes or curtails the owner's legal rights in respect of the property.

3. Injurious affection of property by an Order for the preservation of a building of architectural or historic interest.

Such an order may be made by a county council or other local authority at any time after a resolution to prepare or adopt a town planning scheme has taken effect. [Sec. 17 (1).]

Its effect is to prohibit the demolition of the building without the council's consent. The order, or any variation or revocation of it, does not take effect until approved by the Minister of Health. [Sec. 17 (2).]

Where an order is in force, and an owner has applied to the council to vary or revoke it and to consent to the demolition of the building, there is a right of appeal to the Minister against the council's decision. [Sec. 17 (3).]

Claims for compensation must be made within twelve months of the order coming into operation. The basis of compensation is the amount by which the owner's property is decreased in value by the interference with his legal rights, together with any possible injury to any trade, business or profession carried on on the premises. [Sec. 18 (1).]

The fact that the claim for compensation must be made within twelve months of the order becoming effective—not twelve months from actual refusal to permit demolition—would seem to be of importance. Apparently an owner who does not wish to demolish at the moment, but may want to do so in the future, cannot afford to let the matter slide for the time being, and later apply to the council to vary or revoke the order or permit demolition. For if his application is then refused, he may find that the twelve months allowed for the making of claims has already expired.

4. Damage caused by enforcing a Scheme.

The three types of claim already referred to all come under the head of "injurious affection of property." The fourth type is distinguished by the much broader term "damage."

The kind of act on the part of a responsible authority likely to give rise to a claim under this head is fairly clearly indicated in Section 13. It includes removing, pulling down or altering any buildings or works which contravene or obstruct a scheme, also the prohibiting of any use of land or buildings which is contrary to the scheme. The impression given by Section 18 of an unqualified right to compensation in such cases is speedily removed by Section 20 (2), which makes it clear that no compensation is payable unless the damage complained of is in respect of an existing building or work or an existing use. The expression "existing building" or "existing work" is defined in Section 53. Generally it implies a building or work existing at the date when the resolution to prepare or adopt a scheme was approved by the Ministry. Similarly, "existing use" means, as a rule, the same or a similar use as that to which the property was put at that date. The terms also include any building or work or use permitted under an interim development order.

One may, perhaps, be excused for again emphasising the importance, in the scheme of compensation, of the date of approval of the resolution to prepare or adopt a scheme. Any owner who, after this date, constructs any building or other work, or puts his property to some new use, without first obtaining the consent of the authority under an interim development order, runs the risk of having that building pulled down or altered, or the new user prohibited, without any right to compensation, when the scheme comes into operation.

5. Claims arising out of the revocation or alteration of a Scheme.

It is possible for a resolution to prepare a scheme to be revoked either by a subsequent resolution or by order of the Minister. It is also possible for the scheme, as finally approved, to be varied or revoked by the making of a subsequent scheme. In either case circumstances may arise which entitle the owner to compensation.

Suppose, first, that the resolution to prepare a scheme is revoked. Since the date of approval of the original resolution to prepare the scheme, no prudent owner will have commenced development without first applying for permission to the responsible authority in order to preserve his subsequent right to compensation.

The application may be refused or granted subject to restrictions. An appeal may be made to the Minister, who, in turn, may refuse leave to develop, or grant it subject to restrictions.

There is, as a rule, no right to compensation for restrictions imposed by the Minister on interim development until the scheme comes into operation. The claim may then be added to the claim for injurious affection due to the provisions of the scheme. But if the resolution to prepare or adopt a scheme is revoked, the scheme will not come into operation, and no opportunity for claiming compensation under Section 18 will arise, although for a considerable period the development of the owner's land may be restricted and retarded.

It is therefore provided [Section 6 (5)] that the Minister shall not revoke, or sanction the revocation of, a resolution to prepare a scheme except on condition that owners shall be entitled to claim compensation for injurious affection to property due to restrictions on development previously imposed by him, and also for any abortive expenditure incurred in complying with any conditions imposed on the grant of an application for leave to develop.

The claim must be made within twelve months of the revocation becoming effective.

No right to compensation will be given in respect of restrictions on development if the Minister is satisfied that had similar provisions been contained in the scheme as approved, no compensation would have been payable under the Act.

There seems to be some room for doubt as to whether this exception refers only to the type of provision mentioned in Section 20—in respect of which no compensation can be payable—or whether it extends to the type of provision mentioned in Section 19, in respect of which compensation may be excluded by the terms of a particular scheme.

I venture to submit that the former view is the correct one.

Sometimes during the period between the resolution to prepare a scheme and the date when the scheme comes into operation an owner may have to spend money on buildings or works to comply with some condition imposed or confirmed by the Minister on an appeal against the responsible authority's decision under an interim development order. If the condition was made in anticipation of the land being reserved for some public purpose or the execution of works under the scheme, and no provision for such reservation or works appears in the scheme as finally approved, the scheme must provide for recovery by the owner of so much of the expenditure as is rendered abortive. [Sec. 10 (7).]

The claim must be made within twelve months of the scheme coming into operation.

The question of compensation for expenditure rendered abortive by the variation or revocation of a scheme by the making of a subsequent scheme under Section 8 (3) is covered by Section 18 (1) (c). It is provided that any such expenditure reasonably incurred in complying with any provision in the scheme or in making or resisting a claim in respect of compensation or betterment shall be recoverable by the owner provided the claim is made within twelve months of the variation or revocation becoming operative. An obvious example would seem to be the recovery of surveyor's and solicitor's fees in connection with a claim for injurious affection to land arising from some provision in a scheme which is revoked before the question goes to arbitration.

Where any provision in a scheme is revoked by a subsequent scheme, if the new scheme contains the same or substantially the same provision, no compensation for injurious affection can be claimed in respect of it.

But this does not prejudice the owner's right to—

(i.) proceed with any outstanding claims in respect of the provision under the original scheme ; or

(ii.) submit a claim in respect of it under the original scheme, provided he does so within the time allowed for the making of claims thereunder.

Method of settling disputed Claims.

Unless otherwise agreed between the parties, questions of disputed compensation are to be determined by an official arbitrator appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919. [Sec. 23 (1).]

The arbitrator will have the same powers with regard to procedure costs and the statement of special cases as he has under that Act. Questions which may be determined by the arbitrator are:—

(i.) The claimant's right to compensation ;

(ii.) The amount of compensation.

Disputes as to the claimant's right to compensation will almost certainly involve questions of law turning on the interpretation of the Act. It seems probable that in this connection the arbitrator will frequently resort to his power of stating a case for the opinion of the Court during the hearing, or stating his award in the form of a special case. Since the power is derived from the Acquisition of Land Act, the decision of the High Court will be final. There will be no chance of carrying a disputed point to a higher tribunal.

Power to withdraw or modify Provisions after the Award.

In the case of a claim for injurious affection to property, the responsible authority may, within one month of the award of compensation, give notice that they intend to withdraw or modify the provisions of the scheme which gave rise to the claim.

This is, no doubt, intended to safeguard authorities against unexpectedly heavy claims. A similar provision was contained in the Town Planning Act, 1925.

Where the power is exercised, the responsible authority must submit a varying scheme for the approval of the Minister within three months. When the varying scheme is approved, the owner is entitled to be paid his costs of and in connection with the arbitration, and the arbitrator's award is then discharged. [Sec. 24 (2).]

It seems doubtful whether the expression " costs of and " in connection with the arbitration " would cover all expenses to which the owner might be put in connection with the claim. But he is free to submit a further claim under Section 18 in respect of abortive expenditure incurred in complying with the original scheme, or in making the claim for compensation.

He will also have a right to claim compensation under the scheme, as varied, if he proves that he will still suffer some injurious affection or loss under it.

COMPENSATION FOR LAND COMPULSORILY ACQUIRED.

The responsible authority have a general power to acquire land compulsorily for the purposes of a scheme, except for the purpose of providing accommodation for a person whose premises they have purchased under the scheme. [Sec. 25 (1) and (2).]

Further, where it can be shown that the prescription of a building line renders impracticable the erection of any new building on the land in place of one standing at the date when the scheme comes into operation, the responsible authority may compulsorily acquire the property as it stands within two months of a notice by the claimant under Section 22 (4) of his intention to demolish the existing building.

The compulsory acquisition of land in any particular case is authorised by a compulsory purchase order confirmed by the Minister of Health. [Sec. 25 (2) and Part 1 of Third Schedule.]

The making of the order must be advertised and notices served on owners, lessees and occupiers of the lands affected.

If any objections are made, the Minister must cause a local inquiry to be held before he confirms the order, unless he is satisfied that the objection relates to matters which can be dealt with by the arbitrator by whom compensation is to be assessed.

After the order has been confirmed, its validity may be questioned by application to the High Court on the ground (a) that it is not within the powers of the Act; or (b) that some requirement of the Act, or of any order or regulation under it, has not been complied with.

The assessment of compensation will be governed by the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919.

The following two provisions, which were not present in the Town Planning Act, 1925, are of interest to owners:—

(i.) In assessing compensation, the arbitrator is to ignore any building erected or improvement or alteration made, or any interest in land created after notice of the making of the compulsory purchase order has been published, if he is satisfied that the work was not reasonably necessary and was carried out with a view to obtaining or increasing compensation. [Third Schedule, Part 1, para. 3 (1).]

(ii.) No person shall be forced to sell part only of a house, building or manufactory, or any land form> ing part of a park or garden belonging to a house, if he is able and willing to sell the whole property, unless the arbitrator is satisfied that the part can be taken without material detriment to the house, building or manufactory, or that the loss of a part of the park or garden will not seriously affect the amenity or convenience of the house.

It need hardly be added that where part only is taken, the owner is entitled to full compensation for severance and other injurious affection to the remaining land.

BETTERMENT.

The nature of the Claim.

As in the case of injurious affection, the Town Planning Act, 1925, was extremely vague on the subject of betterment.

It provided simply that " Where, by the making of any " town planning scheme any property is increased in " value, the responsible authority . . . . shall be entitled " to recover . . . . one-half of the amount of that increase."

The present Act [Section 21 (i.)] defines clearly the two cases in which betterment may now be recovered from owners ; they are:—

(i.) Where property is increased in value by the coming into operation of any provision contained in a scheme ;

(ii.) Where property is increased in value by the execution by a responsible authority of any work under a scheme.

In (i.) the responsible authority's claim must be made within twelve months of the date on which the provision comes into operation, or such longer period as may be specified in the scheme. In (ii.) the time limit for the claim, in all cases, is twelve months after the completion of the work which gives rise to it.

The Act also effects the following important changes in the application of the principle of betterment:—

(ii) The amount recoverable by the responsible authority is increased from one-half to three-quarters of the increase in the value of the property.

(ii) In most cases the claim may be deferred until the owner is likely to have derived some concrete benefit from the alleged increase in value.

Deferment of Claims.

With one exception, an owner against whom a claim for betterment is made may, within 28 days, give written notice requiring the claim to be deferred. The exception is where the owner has claimed in respect of injurious affection under the scheme (other than injurious affection immediately suffered) a sum not less than the claim for betterment, and his claim has either been allowed or is still outstanding. [Sec. 21 (i.).]

So far no satisfactory explanation of the words "injurious "affection immediately suffered" appears to have been suggested. It would seem capable of argument that any injurious affection caused by the coming into operation of some provision in, or the doing of some work under, a scheme is "immediately suffered" in the sense that the property is at once depreciated in value, although the owner may not realise the loss in terms of cash until he attempts to sell, mortgage or otherwise deal with his property in the open market.

This is evidently not the interpretation intended by the Act, since it makes the exception meaningless. The intention seems to be to distinguish between (i.) a loss or expense which an owner has actually incurred, and for which he is to be reimbursed by compensation, and (ii.) an injury which the owner expects to suffer on the occasion of any future dealings with the property.

The first type of claim, being in the nature of repayment of loss already suffered, is not to affect the right to have the claim for betterment deferred. In the second case, however, if the claim for estimated injurious affection equals or exceeds the claim for estimated betterment, there is to be no right to defer the charge, since the authority's claim can presumably be met out of the owner's compensation.

Whether this is the sense in which the Courts will interpret the section must, for the moment, remain a matter for considerable speculation.

Where an owner is entitled to have the betterment claim deferred, and gives written notice accordingly, the responsible authority must withdraw the claim, but may make a further claim on the happening of any of the following events:—

(i.) The taking effect of any sale, or of any lease or tenancy agreement for three years or over, of the property within fourteen years of the notice to defer the claim. [Sec. 21 (2) (a).]

In this case the increase in the value of the property will be judged as at the date when the fresh claim is made, and thereafter no further claim is possible. [Sec. 21 (3).]

(ii.) Any change of user of the property within fourteen years from the notice to defer the claim, except where the new user is for agricultural purposes or for forestry. [Sec. 21 (2) (b).]

In this case the increase in value will be judged by reference to the new user, and if any further change of user or any disposition of the land takes place within the original period of fourteen years, a further claim may be made. [Sec. 21 (4).]

(iii.) On the expiration of five years from the date of the notice to defer the claim in the case of property which at the date of the original claim was used for the purpose of any business or industry and in respect of which no claim has been made under (i.) or (ii.) above. [Sec. 21 (2) (c).]

As in case (i.), the increase in the value of the property will be judged as at the date when the deferred claim is made. Thereafter no further claim is possible.

The authority's claim must be made within twelve months from the expiration of the period of five years.

The responsible authority must be notified of any disposition or change of user within one month, and within two months of such notice may require further particulars to be furnished. The obligation to give the notice and furnish particulars is on the person who gave notice to defer the original claim, or on the person on whom the property last devolved before the disposition or change of user occurred. [Sec. 21 (7) and (11).]

The authority's claim for betterment must be made within twelve months of the date of the above notice or of the date when further particulars (if demanded) were furnished to them. But where property is let for less than seven years, the claim must not be made earlier than the end of the seventh year from the start of the term. [Sec. 21 (8).]

It seems clear that, except in the case of business or industrial property, if there is neither sale, nor lease for three years or over, nor change of user of a property, within fourteen years from the notice to defer the original claim for betterment, the responsible authority's right to recover in respect of the particular scheme is extinguished.

The provisions of Section 21 apply to a disposition or change of user of part only of a property in the same manner as to a disposition or change of user of the whole. [Sec. 21 (9).]

Assessment and recovery.

As in the case of compensation for injurious affection, any dispute regarding a claim for betterment will, unless otherwise agreed, be referred to an official arbitrator appointed under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, who may determine—

(i.) the authority's right to recover betterment ;

(ii.) the amount of the betterment ;

(iii.) whether the charge is to be paid as a lump sum or by instalments spread over a term of not more than thirty years. [Sec. 23 (1) and (2).]

Where the amount is payable by instalments, interest on the sum outstanding will be charged at such rate as the Treasury may fix from time to time. But the charge will be redeemable at any time on giving six months' notice and paying the balance of the instalments still outstanding, together with any interest accrued due. [Sec. 21 (6).]

In every case the person against whom the claim is made is the person who gave notice to defer the original claim, or the person on whom the property last devolved before the date on which a disposition takes effect or a change of user occurs. [Sec. 21 (2) and (11).]

Where betterment is payable on the occasion of a sale, therefore, the claim would appear to be a personal one against the vendor with which the purchaser is not concerned.

For this reason it seems likely that payment by instalments will be confined to cases when betterment is payable on the occasion of a lease or change of user, or in the case of industrial or business premises at the expiration of five years from the notice to defer.

Paper 555.

2.—THE PRACTICAL TOWN PLANNING ASPECT.

By John A. Rosevear (Chartered Surveyor),
F.A.I., Associate Member Town Planning Institute, Diploma T.P. and C.E. (London University).

The provisions of the latest Town Planning Act covering " built-up and rural areas " brings almost all landed property within the ambit of a scheme, and hence probably every member of this Institution is affected at some point or in some way by the advent of a town planning scheme.

Those who are best acquainted with the practical problems involved realise not only the vast and far-reaching advantages which may accrue to the community as a whole by wise and adequate control and planning, but also the many pitfalls and difficulties which will be encountered in the practical working out of schemes.

Throughout this Paper I propose to deal with my subject from the landowner's point of view and not from that of the town planning authority.

Exclusions to Compensation.

Mr. David Lawrance in his very able Paper has referred to the Minister of Health's power under Section 19 to exclude compensation for injurious affection in respect of certain types of provisions contained in a scheme. This section is of great practical importance and goes much farther than the similar provisions in the previous Act.

Section 19 deals with the following:—

1. The limitation of density of building units per acre, restriction upon height of buildings and restriction of use to which buildings may be put.

These are all old friends to which we have become accustomed in dealing with areas under or in course of development under town planning schemes. Now that these restrictions can be applied to " built-up " areas being imposed without payment of any compensation to owners, it would appear that the owners may be very greatly hampered in re-development schemes, e.g., such a height restriction might prevent the owner from carrying up his new building to a greater height than the worn-out building to be replaced.

2. The regulation of design and external appearance of buildings.

This is a new measure of control of general application, although for some time past individual town planning schemes have incorporated a clause giving the authority such powers, and the Surrey County Council Act of 1931 (also local Acts of Epsom and Guildford Rural District Councils) enabled authorities in the county of Surrey to control elevations.

I feel sure we shall all agree that, speaking generally, present-day design and elevation on many estates leaves much to be desired, but this regulation gives very drastic powers of control to a town planning authority. To provide for cases where owners are aggrieved by the authority's action in disapproving the design or materials to be used, the scheme must provide for a right of appeal to either—

(a) a Court of Summary Jurisdiction (with a right of appeal to Quarter Sessions ; or

(b) a tribunal constituted under the scheme. [Sec. 12 (1).]

Presumably in the latter case the tribunal would follow those at present in being, e.g., in the county of Surrey, where a local magistrate, a Fellow of the Royal Institute of British Architects and a Chartered Surveyor, both the latter being nominated by their respective Presidents, form the tribunal and whose decision is final.

I can imagine grave doubts assailing the owner who is putting forward an ultra-modern type of design, whether to entrust his case to the former or the latter. At the same time this power may be a very useful one as a protective measure for existing property.

The Act specifically states that a good ground of appeal is the fact that compliance with the local authority's decision to require amendment of the design would involve unreasonably increased cost upon the owner having regard to the character of the surrounding buildings and neighbourhood.

3. Regulation of size of building.

This is also a new provision, and would appear to enable a town planning authority to control not only the maximum size allowed for buildings, but also to stipulate that no building shall be smaller than a stated size. It is a moot point whether it would empower the authority to prevent a bungalow being erected adjoining houses of two or more stories in height.

4. Controlling space about buildings.

Most schemes contain a table prescribing the proportion of site allowed to be covered by buildings, varying according to the height of the building and the user to which it is put. In practice this restriction does often work out awkwardly, and especially in the case of shops and business premises where usually only one-third of the site can be built over if the premises have more than one storey over the shop. This leads to unnecessarily long depths of plots which frequently, in the case of business premises, become unsightly and detrimental to the surrounding property.

The High Court decision in Ellis v. Ruislip-Northwood Urban District Council, (1920), 1 K.B., 343, prevents the exclusion of compensation by the prescription of a building line, subject, however, to item (10) dealt with later.

5. Prohibits or restricts building developments pending the coming into operation of a General Development Order.

The town planning authority can make a general development order at any time by sanction of the Minister, and under Section 15 (2) they must each three years after the scheme comes into operation consider the desirability of making such an order in regard to any land which is still restricted from development.

The general development order may refer to the whole or a part only of the land which by the scheme is prohibited or restricted from building development until such an order is in operation.

In giving consideration to the above five heads of exclusion from compensation, it must be remembered that the Minister must be satisfied that there are adequate safeguards in the scheme to secure the continued use for their present purposes of existing buildings, for their maintenance, and to allow all reasonable extensions and alterations. Also that existing buildings that may be demolished or destroyed are able to be replaced by buildings of equal size. This latter is of great importance now that " built-up " areas " are coming extensively into schemes, for otherwise very serious practical problems would arise where buildings are destroyed by fire or demolished through old age.

If the premises are used for business or industrial purposes, the new building may be erected having at least the same floor space on the ground floor. In other cases the new buildings may be of at least equal cubic capacity above ground level.

All such buildings must be erected within two years of the demolition or destruction unless the town planning authority allow a longer time. The use may be the same or similar to that before even although such may be contrary to the character zoning under the scheme, unless the scheme expressly states such a use to be both contrary to the provisions of the scheme and of a noxious or offensive character.

6. Permanently prohibits or restricts building operations where danger or injury to health would be involved or public services be excessively costly.

This would give power to a town planning authority to prevent, e.g., building development on low-lying or unhealthy sites by reason of liability to flooding, unsuitability of soil or close proximity to a noxious or offensive trade or industry. This power should help in the prevention of future slum areas.

Also the authority have similar powers where the carrying of necessary services such as provision of sewers, water mains, removal of refuse or access roads would require heavy outlay of public monies before such is justified. This is undoubtedly an effort to stem the spasmodic and unsuitable development which has recently been going on in so many parts of the country and has created very great problems for local authorities.

Unless, however, such a power is administered with reasonableness and care, great hardship seems likely to occur to developing owners. The provision of necessary services before perhaps they are, strictly speaking, justified may often be arranged by a substantial contribution being made by the owners concerned under agreement with the local authority.

7. Prohibits or restricts the use of land (apart from buildings) for any purpose likely to be dangerous or injurious to health or seriously detrimental to the neighbourhood.

Throughout previous Town Planning Acts the control exercised by a town planning authority under a scheme has been applicable solely to buildings and the erection of buildings. This new power of control applies to land only, and, no doubt, is considered to be necessary to give the authority control over—

(a) the use of land without any buildings, and

(b) where the buildings are merely temporary structures of various kinds and not "by-law" buildings.

The previous lack of control has undoubtedly been very detrimental to the successful planning of many districts, for it has meant inequality by the strict control of the use of new by-law buildings whilst land alone and temporary structures have been untouched and oftentimes caused serious loss of health and amenity.

I am of opinion that one example which very probably gave rise to this exclusion from compensation is the prevalence in some parts of the outer suburbs of London of chains of gravel-pits. Land was frequently more valuable for the digging of sand and ballast than for building, and with the great demand for these materials in the past few years extensive works were set up needing no permanent buildings and so not controlled by the usual town planning scheme. There was no compulsion on the gravel excavator to fill in again, and the excavation, sometimes 20 feet or more deep, became not only full of stagnant and noisome water but a menace to young children trespassing on the ground and likely to fall in. From the local authority's point of view a number of such old gravel-pits greatly lessened for many years the expansion of rateable value, and general deterioration of the district ensued.

Land also might be used for other offensive uses such as refuse dumps, which were not only unsightly but injurious to health.

The control of camping grounds and land used for temporary habitations such as caravans, temporary sheds and huts, would seem to come under this provision. Not only have the amenities of a choice neighbourhood been adversely affected by such use in many cases, but the total lack of sanitary services has set up a serious prejudice to the health of communities.

Landowners need not fear such control if wisely administered, but would gain by the protection it affords.

There is an important proviso with regard to mineral lands. Compensation may be payable where the town planning authority wish to prevent or restrict the operations in the following cases [Sec. 19 (2) (iii.)]:—

(a) the winning of minerals by underground working ;

(b) the winning of minerals by surface working, with the exception that if such land is character zoned in the scheme as " residential " and has been substantially developed for such purposes, no compensation will be payable ;

(c) if the land in question had been acquired by or devolved upon some person prior to the " material " date " definitely for the winning of minerals by surface working or the owner was desirous of winning same, provided, however, that the Minister is satisfied by representations made to him of the facts in the particular case.

8. The power to control the height and position of proposed walls, fences or hedges near the corners or bends of roads where public safety demands such.

This provision, apparently, may apply to all or any existing private roads and certainly to all new roads not yet maintainable by a local authority.

No one will argue, I feel sure, that some such power is not a necessity in the interests of public safety in these days of rapid road transport. It would appear that the decision as to the position and heights of such boundaries being a menace to public safety would lie solely with the town planning authority. It seems to be clear, however, that the provision applies only to future walls, fences or hedges and does not apply to existing boundaries of this nature. It seems an open point as to whether a group of trees or single trees in the hedge would be able to be controlled as to height, although, of course, the town planning authority could pay compensation for their removal or lopping.

9. The power to limit the number or control the siteing of new roads entering a " classified " road or an existing or proposed road which the Ministry of Transport propose to classify.

A somewhat similar power of control is found in the Surrey County Council Act of 1931. This provision is, no doubt, intended to give the authority the power to control not only ribbon development, but also, from a traffic point of view, to prevent the too frequent entry of side and subsidiary roads into a main road.

If carried out strictly it would tend to encourage " interior " schemes of development reaching back into the hinterland with only an occasional outlet to the classified road, and it would seem we should have a series of " colonies " along such a road with sparse development between each two colonies. It is important to remember, however, that the Minister must be satisfied that not only reasonable means of access from neighbouring land to the classified highway will be provided, but that the particular case is a proper one for the exercise of such control.

Particular care will be necessary by the authority in dealing with such control in practice. In the case of the owner of considerable areas of land with long frontages to the main road the problem may be simple, but where there are many owners with comparatively small frontages many difficulties may arise. It would seem that should an authority try the extreme and prevent all side roads, presuming the unlikely event of the Minister agreeing such, the net result would be ribbon development to the fullest extent and no development behind the frontage plots at all.

10. A power to control building lines.

The town planning authority can fix a line beyond which no building in a street or proposed street may project if for any part of a period of five years preceding the " material date " it did not form the site of, or part of the site of, a building. The provision is not to apply if the area of land remaining to the owner for building purposes will render it less suitable for the erection of buildings in conformity with the scheme.

Building lines can therefore be laid down for all vacant sites (provided that they have been vacant for five years), vacant on the material date subject to the proviso. The provision of the period stated, viz., " any part of a period " of five years," is obviously intended to protect building sites which have become sites during the period owing to the pulling down or destruction of the buildings they carried, and such sites cannot be restricted by the imposition of building lines under the scheme without the payment of compensation. It follows that when sites of this nature arise after the " material date," the provision of the scheme as to building lines will apply and no compensation be payable. Thus the " built-up " area of a district can be dealt with upon re-development under the scheme.

It must be borne in mind that the proviso mentioned above only applies to such buildings as may be erected under the provisions of the scheme and not the type of building previously erected which might, e.g., be of a higher density, greater height or occupy a greater proportion of the site. An example of a case coming under the proviso would seem to arise on a corner site where two roads join and, owing to the building lines imposed by the scheme on the two roads, an insufficient amount of land is left for the erection of a building complying with the scheme. It would appear that in such a case compensation would be payable to the owner either for the loss of the whole site or the measure of loss presuming that some part of the site could be built upon.

Many cases of difficulty would seem likely to arise in the practical carrying out of this provision.

11. The power to require the provision of traffic bays or rear access roads for the loading and unloading of vehicles, to prevent obstruction of traffic on a highway where business or industrial buildings are to be erected.

In the modern lay-out of a shopping, business or industrial area it is usually most necessary to provide for secondary road access for the purposes named, primarily to avoid congestion and obstruction to the main highway, and secondarily for convenience of the business or industry. This provision merely gives power to the town planning authority to stipulate for such without the payment of compensation.

It does entail additional land being given up for roads and possibly increased charges for making up and taking over as against the frontagers. Good estate development, however, on modern lines would allow for such facilities.

There is one objection to the "traffic bay." It does make the total width across the road very great and separates and divorces the shops on one side from the opposite side, and so tends to detract from the value of a group of shops as a market. Shoppers have three roads to cross instead of one.

The Minister of Health, in all these cases of exclusion to compensation, must be satisfied that the provision inserted in the scheme is proper, reasonable and expedient, having regard to the objects of the scheme and to local circumstances. He must also have regard to—

(a) the nature, situation and existing development of the land in question and neighbouring land not so affected, and

(b) the interests of any person who would be affected by the provisions in respect of which compensation is excluded.

The provisions excluding compensation will not be generally applicable to schemes but definite and specific in each local scheme, hence the importance of the consideration of local circumstances by the Minister. Apparently from (a) above, the past or present development of neighbouring land which is not included in the particular scheme would have a definite bearing on the Minister's decision, and under (b) an adjoining owner's possible claim for compensation, although outside the scheme, would be considered as well as that of the owner of the lands within the scheme under inquiry.

It will be noted that Section 19 is of vital importance to landowners; and if hardship is to be avoided, not only must local town planning authorities administer their powers wisely and well, but the Minister also must deal in the utmost spirit of equity with the many diverse problems that will arise.

Control of advertisements and advertisement hoardings.

Section 47 definitely excludes not only compensation but also betterment in the case of action taken by a responsible authority to control or order the removal of an offending advertising hoarding where the land is expressly stated by the scheme to be land " protected under this Act in respect " of advertisements."

The advertisement must, in the opinion of the authority, seriously injure the amenity of the land so specified. An appeal against the notice to remove the offending advertisement, or imposing conditions where advertisements are allowed by the scheme, lies to a petty sessional court for the area in which the land is situate, with a further appeal to Quarter Sessions.

Generally speaking the powers of the authority under this section are not exerciseable for a period of five years from the coming into operation of the scheme, provided that the hoarding was erected or in use at or before the " material " date."

It should be noted that, apparently, it is not necessary for the advertisement hoarding to be actually situate in the protected area as laid down by the scheme, for the serious threat to the amenity of such area may be caused by an erection of this kind on other land.

I hardly think we need waste sympathy upon an owner who is unable to claim compensation owing to the compulsory removal of an advertisement which is an "eye-sore." The owner of a hoarding which does not fall into this category would seem to be well protected by the right of appeal to the Courts.

INTERIM DEVELOPMENT.

The two new matters arising under Section 10 have been mentioned by Mr. Lawrance, and both are of great importance to landowners and are a considerable advance upon practice under the previous Act.

Sub-section (4) definitely empowers a town planning authority to make a cash contribution to an owner whose scheme of development, during the interim period, is either refused or granted subject to conditions placed upon their consent by the authority. It remains to be seen whether in actual fact and practice such contributions will be made, and, if made, whether they will be adequate. The Act states that "the payment shall not be unreasonably "delayed," and the onus of proof of damage or expense is thrown upon the developing owner.

This provision may be of great assistance to both sides during the progress of a scheme. As we know, a scheme for an important area may be a number of years passing through its various stages, and, consequently, the owner's loss, owing to years of delay before he knows his eventual fate, may be serious. A town planning authority for such an area might welcome this solution, and especially where it is difficult to forecast the trend of development. By the payment of a contribution development might be held up, or allowed to proceed with safeguards, until the right type of development agreeing with the eventual scheme can be seen with certainty.

The practical difficulty would seem to be to gauge accurately the damage suffered in the absence of any certain knowledge as to what number of years will elapse before the scheme is finally approved. In these days districts often alter very rapidly in character, with consequent increase or decrease in value, and a neighbouring scheme of re-development—possibly in an adjoining town planning area—may have rapid and far-reaching effects upon the particular owner's land.

The power given under Sub-section (6) of Section 10, whereby an owner may, under certain circumstances, compel the town planning authority to purchase lands for a public open space, is also a valuable provision. So frequently we find local authorities rather glibly talking about reservation of lands for this purpose, and land therefore partially, if not wholly, becoming sterilised as against building development for several years, whilst at the same time no move is made by the authority to take steps to purchase it. The only redress an owner has had has been to suggest that he will claim heavy compensation for loss of building value, but he has not been able to put in any claim until the scheme was finally approved, which may be anything from three to ten years after. Now under this section, provided the land is suitable for immediate development and would be actually developed within a normal period of time, whilst it should properly be reserved under the scheme for a public open space, the owner may, upon the dismissal of his appeal to be allowed to develop by the Minister, serve notice requiring the authority to purchase the land, the price being either mutually agreed or settled by an official arbitrator, and the town planning authority are bound to purchase.

This provision may have a salutary effect upon those authorities who sometimes appear rather prodigal in allocating lands for public open spaces, in the early stages of their schemes, in the hope that by some means and at some future time the land will become available for that purpose, but who seem to be seldom ready to pay for such land and in the meantime raise very difficult problems for the landowner.

SEVERANCE.

The alteration of the law allowing a part only of a building or a portion of the garden or grounds attached to a house to be taken, as laid down in the Third Schedule to the Act, will raise new practical problems.

The lack of any powers to acquire compulsorily a part only has been a great protection in the past, and especially to private mansions standing in their own parks. Claims for severance will now arise, and no doubt much evidence given on one side or the other to prove or disprove "material detriment" or "loss of amenity or convenience" caused by the taking of the part only.

Presumably the inclusion of built-up areas in schemes has tended to this addition to the powers given under the previous Act.

BETTERMENT.

Mr. Lawrance has set forth very clearly the provisions of the Act regarding the securing by a town planning authority of some part of the increased value attributable to the making and carrying out of a scheme. To the present, in actual practice, we have little experience of claims for betterment.

Authorities have used their powers in this respect more for purposes of bargaining with landowners and as offsets to claims for compensation than in putting forward and endeavouring to recover actual claims in £. s. d.

With the more precise powers under the present Act, and with the increase to 75 per cent., it would seem that claims will be more frequently forthcoming.

One little practical point is sometimes overlooked, viz., that a claim can be made against an owner whose land is outside the area of the scheme, for the statute refers to " any property increased in value." In advising landowners whose properties are on the fringe of schemes, this must be borne in mind when considering the effect on their land or buildings, and such properties might conceivably be affected by two adjoining schemes in varying respects.

It should be noted that change of user to agricultural purposes, within the term of fourteen years from date of notice to defer a claim, includes use as a poultry farm, nursery grounds, or allotment gardens, and neither of these uses gives rise to any further claim.

HOW AND WHEN CLAIMS MAY BE MADE. [Sec. 22.]

A claim for either compensation or betterment must be made in writing, be served upon the authority or individual concerned, and state the grounds of claims and the amount so claimed.

Mr. Lawrance has carefully stated in the course of his Paper the periods within which claims must be made as laid down by the Act. I think this is of such importance that it will bear reiteration. Speaking generally, all claims have to be made within a period of twelve months (or any longer period which may be specified in the particular scheme) after—

(1) the date on which the provision in the scheme giving rise to the claim came into operation, or

(2) the date on which action or work by the responsible authority under the scheme was completed, or

(3) the date on which an order of the responsible authority came into operation, or

(4) the date the variation or revocation of the scheme became operative which gave rise to the abortive expenditure.

There is an exception with regard to " building line " provisions, which it is important to bear in mind. Provided that the site was actually occupied by a building for two years prior to the "material date," a claim arising from a building line provision for injurious affection may be made within twelve months after the erection of the " new " building which conforms to the line laid down. It may be, however, that it is not practicable to put up a new building conforming to the line laid down, and in this event the claim can be made within twelve months of the demolition of the " old " building, or after the scheme came into operation, whichever is the later date, provided, however, that proper notice of such a pending claim and of the proposed demolition was given to the town planning authority three months before the demolition. When the authority receives such a notice, they may elect within two months of receipt of the notice to purchase the site and existing building, under their compulsory powers, in a similar manner to other lands comprised within the scheme. It would appear that after such notice, if the authority does not purchase the existing building and site, that a full claim for loss would lie, which presumably would include loss of trade or business carried on upon the premises.

APPEALS TO THE MINISTER.

Although there are other rights of appeal given by the Act, the appeals mostly concerned with the securing of rights to compensation are to the Minister of Health, and in this sense the question of appeals is a most vital one. Space forbids to deal with this aspect of the subject deeply, but I think there is little doubt that appeals under the new Act will be very numerous indeed.

In practice almost every question of divergence of opinion between a town planning authority and a landowner as to present or future development means going to appeal. At present it seems to me that the scales are rather weighted as against the owner by not only delay, which is ofttimes serious, but the heavy expense incurred in an appeal.

Excepting in quite small cases, it is usually necessary to instruct a solicitor with expert knowledge of town planning law—and in important cases to brief counsel—and certainly so in the case of an appeal against a county, city or borough council, whose case will undoubtedly be presented by a member of the legal profession. Expert town planning and professional witnesses, as well as local surveyors, are necessary, also the requisite plans, maps and diagrams. A quite small case will entail 50 to 100 guineas in costs and expenses, but there are no arrangements for recovering these against the authority if the appeal succeeds.

I know of one case only where an application for costs was granted by the Minister, an appeal against the Bexhill Urban District Council, which was conducted by a well-known legal member and past-president of the Town Planning Institute.

I feel quite sure that this possibility of heavy loss in costs and expenses deters many of the smaller owners from exercising their rights of appeal, and hence full justice is not secured.

In concluding this rather inadequate opening of a subject which bristles with difficulties and complexities, I desire to point out that, so far as I can ascertain, the present-day trend of feeling at the Ministry would seem tc construe the powers of the Act as regards the inclusion of "built-up areas" very broadly indeed. This certainly applies to boroughs around the metropolis, outside the administrative county of London, where approval has been given to resolutions to include the whole of their areas in the new schemes.

I think, therefore, we can foresee a great deal of practical work arising for both the legal profession and our own when the schemes progress through their various stages. I am sure that members of The Institution will, in their wisdom, do their best, whilst adequately serving their clients, by their attitude to these problems to improve the schemes which come before them so that they may become upon maturity proper and business-like schemes, for the general good of, not only all landowners, but the community as a whole.

Note.—In the Appendix will be found a few normal cases giving rise to claims for compensation or betterment (or both), mostly being the class of case which is likely to come before the average chartered surveyor.

APPENDIX.

A FEW PRACTICAL EXAMPLES OF PROVISIONS OR WORKS GIVING RISE TO CLAIMS FOR COMPENSATION OR BETTERMENT (OR BOTH).

1.—A new By-Pass or Arterial Road.

This may give rise to a claim for betterment and especially if it passes through land which is now somewhat remote. Obviously the construction of such a road, which is usually a "declared" street under the scheme, the cost of which will be met by the authority, will improve the value of the surrounding land from a building point of view, and tend to ripen same. There is, however, another point of view, where such a road passes close to existing buildings and especially if such are good-class residences. The new road brings noise, vibration and smell and will depreciate the residential property of this class, which seeks quiet and seclusion. A claim for injurious affection would arise, provided that actual land of such properties will be taken for the road and also claims for severance occur.

2.—A Main Sewerage Scheme.

Such a scheme if carried out under the town planning scheme might give rise to a claim for betterment, although it must be borne in mind that the authority may be wanting from the landowner not only facilities but actual lands for pumping stations, sewage works, pipes lines, &c., and so such a claim be more than off-set by a claim for injurious affection to the surrounding lands if in the same ownership.

3.—The stopping up or diversion of a Road.

This may give rise to a claim for compensation if the access to land or existing properties is made worse. A " diversion " might give rise to improvement of land or buildings, and hence a betterment claim arise.

4.—A Business or Shopping Area.

It would appear that in a scheme which limits the shopping areas to distinct sites and if such sites happen to be owned by a small owner who is fortunate enough to possess the land so zoned, but not other " residential " surrounding land, he might receive a claim for betterment owing to the increased value of his holding. I do not think such a claim would lie if the landowner was a large owner, for it would be natural for some portion of his extensive holding to be allocated for shops and he would not in the same way possess a " monopoly " value.

5.—Open Spaces, Public and Private.

The public open space frequently gives rise to a claim for betterment against the surrounding owners in view of the " lung " provided by the authority. This is clear if the open space is a park or country reservation, but the matter may be quite different if the space is for intensive sport.

A municipal football ground or greyhound racing track may be an " open space," and yet have very detrimental effects on the surrounding property. In such a case a claim might lie for injurious affection, depending somewhat on the class of neighbourhood and type of property surrounding and provided that land is actually taken from the surrounding owners.

The " private open space " is of rather a different character. In this case the actual land still remains in the ownership of the individual and is not purchased by the authority. He has rights of ownership excepting as to use, and hence, under the Act, clearly he has a claim for compensation, his legal rights are curtailed and infringed by the provisions of the scheme. The owner can use his land in a limited way, viz., as a " private open space," which is defined by the Model Clauses as " land reserved for use " as a private ground for sports, play, rest or recreation or as an ornamental garden or pleasure ground." With the approval of the authority they may also be used for purposes of agriculture and horticulture or for such other purposes as the authority may permit.

No buildings are allowed to be erected at any time with the exception of such buildings as may be necessary for the prescribed use of the ground, e.g., sports pavilions, summer houses, or agricultural buildings if the latter use is allowed.

The basis of claim, in such a case, is the difference between the value of the land for building purposes at a suitable density under the scheme and its value for sports or other " private open space " purposes. The difference between the two capital values would be a legitimate claim for loss of value against the town planning authority, assuming, of course, that the land is so situate that it actually has ripe building value which can be substantiated.

It is possible that betterment might be claimed and set off as against this difference in value, owing to the improvement in value of the land surrounding the private open space.

A DISCUSSION took place on Messrs. D. M. LAWRANCE and J. A. ROSEVEAR'S Papers entitled

COMPENSATION AND BETTERMENT UNDER THE TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING ACT, 1932.

Mr. C. GERALD EVE (Past-President) said it was his privilege to propose a vote of thanks to Mr. Lawrance and Mr. Rosevear for their Papers. There was a great deal to be learned from them ; he himself had learned a great deal. Indeed, he had been surprised at some of the things said in the Papers, and he had come to the conclusion that many of his own preconceived opinions were wrong, and also, he believed, the preconceived opinions of many of those who had been serving on the Parliamentary Committee of The Institution.

Mr. Lawrance on page 206 raised an extremely important point with regard to interim development. An owner whose land was zoned or reserved as a private open space in a stage of town planning not yet final might say " I want to build, or I want " to sell to a builder who wants to build. I will apply to the " town planning authority for an interim order to get on with " the building." The town planning authority replied " No, " but under Section 10 (5) we will give you a contribution towards " the damage or expense to which you will be put by turning " down your application ; we will give you £150." The owner might say to himself " I do not expect it is any good appealing " to the Minister ; I had better take the £150," and he would do so in the belief—which would be a false belief—that when the scheme was final he would come under the provisions of Section 18 (1), which said that " any person whose property is injuriously affected by the coming into operation of any provision " contained in a scheme " might claim compensation. Then the owner would turn to Section 23 (2) (iii.), where he would find that the arbitrator charged with the duty of determining compensation must have regard " if any contribution "—in the example given, the £150—" has been made by an authority under the provisions " of this Act relating to interim development orders," and must take that contribution into account. The owner whose interim application had been turned down, and who took a cheque for £150 on account of what he hoped to get later, £650, hoping to get the other £500 when the scheme was final, and being satisfied that the arbitrator would take the £150 into account and deduct it from the £650, would then wake up, if he had not read Mr. Lawrance's Paper before, and re-read Section 18 (2) ; and if he did that he would find that he had not even a locus standi to send for the arbitrator to give him the £500, because, unless that owner appealed to the Minister against the local authority's refusal to let him go on, he had no locus standi to send for the official arbitrator. Section 18 (2) said: "In awarding any compensation "payable in respect of property injuriously affected . . . . account "shall be taken of any additional injurious affection of the pro-"perty by reason that since the commencement of this Act the "Minister"—not the town planning authority—"has refused, "on an appeal made to him under an interim development order, "to grant an application for permission to develop the property." Therefore, as Mr. Lawrance pointed out, if the local authority turned an owner down when he applied for an interim order, the owner should not accept anything unless satisfied that he was getting full and final compensation for being turned down. It was necessary otherwise to put in at least a pro forma appeal to the Minister, and then, if one were turned down by the Minister, when the scheme was final, one could send for the official arbitrator and say "I want £650, and I have had £150 on account."

Surveyors to-day were much more concerned with interim town planning than with the position when schemes were final. When there were several schemes which were final they would be more interested in that, but they were more interested now in the interim position, and Mr. Lawrance gave a most important warning on page 206, where he said: "The only method of safe-"guarding the owner's right to full compensation for loss suffered "during the interim period is to appeal to the Minister of Health "within twenty-eight days against the responsible authority's "decision under the interim development order." Personally he would commend that to all surveyors, and especially to himself, as a point not to be missed.

Mr. Rosevear dealt with the same point on page 232 in the section of his Paper headed "Interim Development," and, speaking of negotiating with regard to the £150, said: "The practical "difficulty would seem to be to gauge accurately the damage "suffered." If the Ministry had refused an owner's interim application or had imposed conditions on its grant, then the owner would know that in five or six years' time, when the scheme was final, he could ask for the extra £500 on top of the £150 ; if, on the other hand, the owner did not go to the Minister, then the £150, or whatever the sum was, was final and could not be reopened. It was to the latter case only that Mr. Rosevear must be referring when he spoke of the practical difficulty of gauging accurately the damage suffered. It was quite unnecessary accurately to gauge the damage suffered where one had met with a refusal or conditions by the Minister on an interim application, because one could put that right before the official arbitrator when one claimed the extra £500. Of course if one did not intend to appeal to the Minister it was necessary to gauge accurately the damage suffered.

Turning to another point altogether, changes of user, one might be prohibited under a scheme from changing the user, and he would therefore suggest that on built-up estates it might be of importance to landowners to keep an estate record for their own use of existing users, so that they could prove that users either have or have not been changed, as the case might require.

Mr. Lawrance, dealing with deferment of claims for betterment, pointed out on page 219 (iii.) that on the expiration of five years claims for betterment could be made. That was intended to deal with companies which generally did not sell or lease or change the user; they might be quite free of any attack on them for betterment unless there were some periodic times when betterment might be assessed. He thought there would be general agreement that some such provision was necessary, so that they should not escape the net which was set for all.

He would like to emphasise what Mr. Lawrance said, namely, that one could get compensation only if one's legal rights were infringed or curtailed, whereas betterment could be assessed upon any property if betterment in fact occurred. Mr. Rosevear gave the instance of a football ground or greyhound racing track which was permitted next door to one's property. If none of one's land were taken, but one found that by the scheme something very objectionable, such as a greyhound racing track, was occurring on the land adjoining, one could not claim compensation because one did not like the scheme. Before compensation could be claimed it was necessary that one's legal rights should be infringed or curtailed; in other words, unless an action would lie apart from the town planning nothing could be done. On the other hand, if a recreation park were established on the land adjoining, to which the nurse could be sent with the perambulator, one would receive a claim for betterment.

He thought that Mr. Rosevear, on the last line of the penultimate paragraph on page 240, meant "potential building "value" and not "ripe building value."

He would like to add a word on Section 34 of the Act. Section 34 empowered the town planning authority and owners to enter into agreements. The owner, so far as his interest in the land enabled him to bind it, could bind his estate, "restricting "the planning, development, or use thereof." He would urge owners to think very carefully before they took action under Section 34. By entering into any such agreement in consideration of being left out of the town planning scheme they could obviously get no compensation. It would be of interest to hear Mr. Lawrance's view of whether they would also be free from any claims for betterment. If, however, an owner by deed entered into covenants with the town planning authority, he would have deeds affecting his property running with the land, and probably registered under the Land Charges Act. If he wanted to sell the property and were asked whether there were any charges or restrictions on the land, he would have to say that there was that deed ; whereas if he merely said "It is town planned," people did not mind that. He suggested it was a serious matter to enter into an agreement of that kind with the town planning authority ; one was more likely to frighten off lessees or purchasers by a deed than merely by saying that the land, like the rest of England, was town planned. Moreover, as he had already stated, under Section 34 there was no chance of compensation, and he was waiting to hear from Mr. Lawrance what the chances were of betterment.

There was a great deal to be learned from the most lucid and able Papers presented by Mr. Lawrance and Mr. Rosevear, and he had great pleasure in proposing that a vote of thanks be accorded to them.

Mr. REGINALD POOLE (Fellow) said it was his very pleasant duty to second the vote of thanks to the writers of the two most interesting Papers which had been presented.

The authors were in the difficulty that so far there were comparatively few schemes which had been finally approved ; the majority, as Mr. Gerald Eve had already stated, were in their interim stage. Compensation, as was well known, had had a tremendous effect on those schemes. In many case it had caused local authorities to withdraw their proposals; for example, in the case of a new road cutting through an estate they had been faced with a claim for compensation by the owner, and that had sometimes necessitated varying the proposals. Very little had been heard about betterment in practical cases, but it had been used on many occasions as a lever for obtaining concessions from the landowner. Mr. Rosevear, in the practical points at the end of his Paper, dealt with the case of a by-pass road. In the past a local authority which proposed to construct a by-pass road was faced with a claim for severance from the landowner in addition to the value of the land, but in view of the town planning powers the landowner to-day, perhaps, looked at the matter from a slightly different standpoint, and would agree that when the road was constructed he would possess land on the new road frontages which was of greater value than before.

Personally he felt that many such cases could be settled out of court ; if the owner and the local authority discussed matters across a table a number of difficulties could be overcome, and that would save expense and time and prevent any loss of that good feeling between landowners and local authorities which was essential for the satisfactory completion of a town planning scheme.

Mr. Lawrance had dealt primarily with possible cases of compensation, while Mr. Rosevear dealt in the major portion of his Paper with cases where the right to compensation could be excluded by the authority in its scheme under Section 19. Section 19 dealt very extensively, of course, with the rights which local authorities possessed and which excluded the right to compensation. One important point in Section 19 was that the vague term " character " had been dropped—that being the term in the Act of 1925—and the words " design, external appearance and " use of buildings " substituted.

He would have liked to hear a little more from Mr. Lawrance on the question of compensation for improvement schemes in built-up areas. Before the Act of 1932 a number of local authorities had obtained powers for the town planning of built-up areas by means of a private Act ; in addition to Newcastle, Derby, Eastbourne and other places had similar powers, which, however, proved largely ineffective owing to the question of compensation for severance. There were possibilities of numerous claims being made, even for very small areas. It would be interesting in the future to see the cases which arose in connection with severance, particularly in the case of built-up central areas. Generally speaking he thought the claims for compensation under the 1932 Act were very similar to those under the Act of 1925, with the exception of claims in regard to built-up areas, where claims might be made for loss of trade or business or damage to a profession.

Mr. Rosevear dealt in his Paper with built-up areas and with what an owner might be permitted to do in respect of his premises. That was very important with regard to the question of claims for compensation in such areas. It seemed clear that an owner might maintain his existing buildings and might make certain alterations and certain additions to existing buildings, and if a building were demolished or destroyed by fire, the owner had the right, under the 1932 Act, to erect a new building of equal cubic capacity, and in the case of a business of trade of a similar superficial area for the ground floor. The owner also had the right to put that new building to a similar use to that to which the previous building was put. Those points were important in setting a standard for claims for compensation in regard to built-up areas.

Reference had been made to the new provision for dealing with plans, which must be dealt with by the local authority within two months of their submission. That had had an important effect on the zoning of open spaces. A landowner who had land which was zoned as a public open space could submit a plan for the development of that land, and, if the landowner could prove that that land was ripe for development, and the local authority rejected his plans, he had a right to claim that the local authority should purchase the land within six months. That had had a material effect upon certain schemes, because in the past a local authority could reserve a large number of areas for open spaces and then sit on the fence and say they would restrict the land until such time as the scheme was approved, which might be years hence. Now they had to deal with such an area at once if the landowner could prove that the land was ripe for immediate development.

Mr. Rosevear had referred to the control of elevations. The tribunal of three—a magistrate, an architect and a surveyor—was usually known as the Bath Clause, having been instituted in the Act of 1925 of the Bath Corporation, and it had worked well. It did not necessarily mean that all the plans must be referred to that tribunal, but it did mean that the architect and the local surveyor or engineer got together and agreed their plans in a way they might not otherwise have done.

Mr. Rosevear mentioned the prevention of obstruction to view at corners. Provision had been made in the new Model Clauses for such cases, which were complementary to Section 4 of the Road Improvement Act of 1925, empowering local authorities to control the view-points on the corners of all roads.

Professor S. D. ADSHEAD (Visitor) said he was particularly interested in Section 12 of the Act, which dealt with the control of elevations. The Model Clauses gave power to a local authority to refuse to accept elevations or buildings the external appearance of which would seriously disfigure the locality, but there the power seemed to rest. There was nothing about the building itself, and he could imagine plans for a very ugly building, very incompetently designed and which was an absolute outrage, being submitted to a local authority possessing town planning powers, and, if it was to be erected in an area where there were no other buildings, and where there were no other proposals before the authority so that it could not be said the locality would be damaged, it might be that nothing could be done. It might be said that it would damage the fields, but it could not be touched simply because it was ugly; it had seriously to damage the locality. He would like to see the Model Clause in question amended to allow a tribunal to condemn a building on its own inherent bad qualities. He knew it was difficult, and whether the ground of disapproval should be described as incompetency, illiteracy, outrage or vulgarity or what not, he did not know, but when he came to advise the clerk to the council for whose area he was acting as consultant he would endeavour to get him to amend the Model Clause with reference to elevations so as to endavour to control the building itself as well as the influence of the building on the locality.

Another point which had not so far been raised was that it would appear that when the elevations of the building were put before the tribunal they must be either approved or rejected. As an architect, and as one who had had some little experience in approving or disapproving buildings, he felt it was difficult for an architect to say that he approved or disapproved of a building; he always wanted to fiddle with it, to improve it or to amend it. Personally, therefore, he felt there should be some provision in the Model Clauses whereby approval could be made contingent on the fulfilment of certain conditions. He did not pretend to be able to deal with the legal aspects of the Act in the lucid and clear way in which that had been done by the authors, but as an architect he was more interested in plastering up the crevices and seeing how the powers contained in the Act could help the ship along.

He was particularly interested in Section 12 (1) (e), which conferred powers of regulation on the local authority. He did not know what that meant, and would welcome a definition of what it might include. Personally he was going to try to make it include anything. That section, read in conjunction with Section 15, whereby the local authority might issue a general development order permitting building in those areas which were otherwise restricted from the operations of building, seemed to him to constitute a piece of administrative town planning which, if used in the fullest and wisest manner might go a long way towards carrying out something which could really be called town planning. He felt that there was a general tendency in the Act of 1932 to convert town planning into regulating development. Ever since the old Act of 1909 there had been a succession of legislative measures directed to the control of development and not town planning. He did not say that that was not good in some cases. The old idea of basing town planning on the making of a scheme having reference to a particular area was all right when town planning was confined to undeveloped areas, but to utilise the same system in regard to built-up areas was, he thought, going to cause great confusion.

Mr. A. M. TRUSTRAM EVE (Barrister-at-Law) said that there was a provision which was tucked away in the First Schedule of the Act, Part II., paragraph 4, which said: "Subject "to the provisions of paragraphs two and three of this Part of the "Schedule, the validity of a scheme shall not, either before or "after it has been approved or made, be called in question in "any legal proceedings whatsoever, and shall become operative at "the expiration of six weeks from the date on which the notice "required by the provisions of paragraph one of this Part of "this Schedule is published." That paragraph was an important one, because the scheme when made contained a large number of clauses. There had been an opportunity of seeing—it was true in a provisional form only—a number of what would be called in the future "Model Clauses." The paragraph which he had read meant that every one of those clauses, if put into a scheme, would, when the scheme was approved, become an Act of Parliament. It was not unimportant, therefore, to remember that there were a great many sections of the Act, but that there were still more clauses which would be Acts of Parliament when a scheme was finally approved.

In the provisional document which had been circulated there were 84 clauses, 7 schedules, 2 appendices and 103 pages, all of which must be studied and all of which had equal effect with the Act when incorporated in a scheme. If, of course, those clauses were fair—as no doubt they would be, in view of the source from which they came—and if, which was perhaps not quite so certain, they were administered fairly by all the numerous town planning authorities which existed, there was nothing to worry about.

There was one point, however, which he did desire to emphasise. Mr. Rosevear had stated, and he most respectfully concurred with him, that one of the most important sections in the Act was Section 19. Section 18, it would be remembered, was a section which gave compensation to everybody for everything, and Section 19 proceeded to take most of it away again. It was perfectly true to say that Section 19 was reasonably fettered with the control of the Minister of Health, if the Minister considered this and that reasonable. There was at present no guide as to what the Minister of Health would consider reasonable except the provisional document of 103 pages which came from him, and which, presumably, he thought was reasonable. It was very important to bear in mind, therefore, that, rightly or wrongly, in that provisional document there was a clause, Clause 74, which made it clear that every single matter mentioned in Section 19 of the Act was excluded from compensation in the Provisional Model Clauses. It was only fair to say that that was only a Model Clause and could be altered to suit circumstances, but it was right that everyone should realise that in the Model Clause compensation was prima facie excluded. He was not saying whether that was right or wrong, but that meant that every single provision in a town planning scheme which provided for zoning for building—e.g., where certain land was reserved for residential or industrial use—was entirely excluded from compensation.

He ventured to submit that one of two things would happen. If it were correct law for the moment that compensation was not payable in respect of such zoning, there was a new provision in the Model Clauses—he was not sufficiently au fait to know the reason for it—to the effect that when the scheme became final the appeal lay not to the Minister of Health—a procedure to which most people were accustomed and with which they were completely satisfied—but to a court of summary jurisdiction, with an appeal from that court of summary jurisdiction to Quarter Sessions in every case—a delightful prospect for the lawyers.

He thought, however, the following position might arise. One might appeal to the summary court or to Quarter Sessions, a court without, perhaps, much knowledge of town planning (though not, as Mr. Rosevear suggested, with the mayor in the chair, because probably the mayor would be disqualified), and what might happen was that decisions might be given, not, as some people thought, unfavourable to the landowner, but too favourable to him. The court would be faced with the fact that the unfortunate appellant had had his land zoned for something, and they might doubtless say "Whatever he does he cannot "get any money out of the local authority; let us give him "permission to build." That was a possibility.

On the other hand, it might be that under Section 19 the present view of the Minister might not be right. The present view of the Minister obviously was that all such zoning fell or could fall within Section 19. It was a little curious that, for some reason best known to themselves, Parliament had decided to alter the language of the Act of 1925. The Act of 1925 provided in Section 11, it would be remembered, that compensation should not be payable in respect of any provision which prescribed the height or character of buildings, and left it at that. It was a vague expression ; few people knew what it meant ; but it had the advantage that someone took it to the courts, and there was a decision of the courts as to what it did mean, namely, that it included zoning for, say, industrial buildings. Immediately after the decision (Long v. Derby Corporation) a new Act was passed with different language, which used different words, and which did not include expressly in its language any restriction against the erection of buildings, but only restriction against the use of buildings. Difficult and legal problems might arise, but he thought all those who were anxious that town planning should take place on proper lines would agree that there must be a prohibition against the erection of some sort of building, whether it were a factory in residential areas or whatever it might be. If the Act meant that every single person affected was to obtain compensation, it would make planning a dead letter in no time, and therefore he had ventured to put forward under Section 19 those two extreme possibilities: (1) that compensation might be payable in respect of a very large number of things under the section, and (2) that no compensation was payable, but that appeals would be granted too readily by the appeal tribunal, the court of summary jurisdiction. He ventured to suggest that Mr. Rosevear might be right in saying that it would be far better if the Provisional Model Clauses contained the right of appeal through the Inspectors of the Ministry of Health, who did understand town planning, to the Minister.

There were two other short points to which he would like to refer. Mention had been made by the mover of the vote of thanks to Section 18 (2), and the difficulties of obtaining compensation if one did not appeal to the Minister of Health had been pointed out. He would like respectfully to concur and to emphasise the importance of the question. In all interim matters the golden rule under the Act was to appeal, whether satisfied with the decision or not. Another hardship, however, arose under that section. A long period would elapse in between the interim decision of the local authority and the final approval of the scheme, and compensation for that period could not be obtained unless there was an appeal. That, at least, was remediable, but the situation which would arise and which had arisen in practice in his experience was this. A piece of land was scheduled as a private open space in the early stages. An appeal to the local authority and to the Minister was refused ; it was still a private open space. "Very well," the owner might say, "I do not "like it, but at least I shall get compensation." A year afterwards the local authority, probably for financial reasons, changed its mind and decided to zone that piece of land for houses. The landowner for the future got what he wanted ; but no compensation was provided by the Act for the time that the land was scheduled as a private open space. That was one practical loop-hole in the Act.

The other point was in regard to betterment. Mr. Rosevear had boldly stated, and other speakers had assumed, that betterment was more favourable than injurious affection, and reasons for that view had been given. That might be so, but Mr. Rosevear went further and said betterment could be claimed for a property outside the bounds of the scheme. Personally he wondered whether that was right. It was true that the words of the Act were general, but he doubted very much whether the words "any "property" could mean any property in Great Britain. He ventured to submit for Mr. Rosevear's consideration that "any "property" meant any property within the ambit of the scheme. If betterment were to apply outside, it was obvious that injurious affection must do so also, because the words in the two sections were identical ; and it seemed a little curious that anybody in England could claim for injurious affection by, say, the prescription of a railway in the urban district of X injuriously affecting—or, in the reverse case, bettering—his property.

The SECRETARY read the following letter from Mr. STEPHEN CHART (Associate) who was unable to attend the meeting:—

I regret that I am unable to attend on Monday next when Messrs. Lawrance and Rosevear are submitting their very useful and interesting Papers, but I should be glad if you would put before the authors the following matter:

On page 206 Mr. Lawrance states that "the protection of "the owner's rights in relation to compensation is a matter for "practical consideration as far back as the date when the "responsible authority's resolution to prepare or adopt a scheme "is approved by the Minister of Health."

Now Section 18 of the Act provides for the recovery of compensation by any person (a) whose property is injuriously affected by the coming into operation of any provision contained in a scheme.

At a meeting which I attended recently, when the Act was discussed, the proposition was submitted that under the provisions of the Act no compensation could be claimed for any loss caused to an owner who had developed his land in accordance with the proposed scheme under an interim development order, if such development was completed before the coming into operation of the scheme (i.e., before the date of the final approval). For example, if in order to comply with the proposed line of a new road, included in the preliminary statement, an owner had been compelled to develop his property in a less economical way than that which he would have adopted, and the development was completed before approval of the scheme, no claim would be admissible. This proposition, if accepted, would be a direct encouragement to the local authority to delay as long as possible the final approval of the scheme in the hope of avoiding the payment of any compensation by forcing the development between the time of the first resolution and the final approval. This proposition, which at first sight seems absurd, was, however, upheld when a case was submitted upon this point to a very eminent counsel, and I should be glad if the authors of the Paper to be read on 9th April would give their views on this.

Mr. W. THORPE (Fellow) said that they read and learned how they could get compensation in the future, but how could they get compensation in the present? He was engaged in a case at the moment concerning a client's property in a main road where shops could be built. He applied to the local authority for permission to erect shops, but his application was refused owing to the fact that 50 feet of the property was to be taken for widening. Plans were submitted and passed for building back to the 50-ft. line. The owner then applied for compensation. After eighteen months' negotiations with the local authority they had got no satisfaction. The owner obtained counsel's opinion, and made a further application to the council. The local authority now said that the town planning scheme had not yet been passed and, therefore, compensation could not be claimed. It was his (the speaker's opinion) that a town planning scheme took too long to become final. There should be some means whereby the compensation could be settled after the owner had built back to the 50-ft. line. He considered that the local authority was trying to use this Act to get the owner to give up his land for nothing.

The other point concerned elevations. He agreed that there should be control of elevations, but Mr. Rosevear mentioned that it was not stringent. Personally he had come across a case where it was. A client of his put forward plans of houses with modern elevations. They were passed, and the houses were built. Another application was then put in for more houses on the other side of the road, and they were passed and the houses built. A third set was then put in to the council, types similar to the second application, and were disapproved on account of elevation. There was no town planning scheme in existence, and there was no tribunal. If he could go forward to the tribunal, as would be possible once the town planning scheme came into force, it would be quite satisfactory, but some four months had now passed, and he was still waiting for the Ministry of Health to hear the appeal. He made no complaint of the Ministry, because doubtless they were overworked and should have more surveyors to deal with the matter ; but there was delay after delay, and he could not understand why the town planning schemes were not carried out and finished. He thought the authorities kept on as they did to force the building owner to give up the land without the usual compensation.

Mr. W. HAYLEY MASON (Probationer) said that as a very Junior Member he was grateful for the opportunity to raise one or two practical questions. At present he was interested in a small building estate of some 31 acres. At the time the town planning scheme was originally approved, the land was more or less agricultural, and the area was zoned as residential. In the course of eighteen months the situation had changed, and development had taken place which had created a market there for shops. The result was that the estate received an attractive offer for a certain amount of frontage provided shops could be built there. Those responsible for making the offer attempted to negotiate with the town planning authority with a view to obtaining their consent to the erection of shops, but were unsuccessful, and as a result the offer was withdrawn.

What interested him was the position of the owner in such a case. They were attempting to negotiate in a friendly way with the town planning authority with a view to obtaining a relaxation of the provision, but if they could not obtain satisfaction he would be interested to hear the views of members as to how far they could go in law to obtain relaxation and as to whether they could get any compensation.

Professor Adshead had suggested that town planning authorities might be given further powers with regard to restrictions on the architectural design of buildings. It seemed to him that their powers were already wide, and that it was not necessary to extend them.

Dr. R. C. MAXWELL (Visitor) (Past-President of the Town Planning Institute) said he was greatly honoured by the invitation to attend that evening, and had found it a pleasure to listen to such excellent Papers. Mr. Lawrance would perhaps forgive him if he mentioned that he (Mr. Lawrance) was not the first to worry about the snag in Section 21 of the Act, the words "injurious "affection immediately suffered," because his friend Mr. Jenkins and himself were worried about it when he had the pleasure of preparing a couple of lectures for the College of Estate Management. He himself had not been able to suggest any solution, but was interested to hear what Mr. Lawrance had to say on the matter.

Mr. Rosevear's Paper on the practical side of the subject was intensely interesting. When he was preparing the lectures referred to he had found it difficult to understand the Act ; at first it was difficult to see the wood for the trees. In his attempt to get hold of some useful information he studied carefully one of the first Papers on the Act, which was a Paper by his friend Mr. Rosevear.

The Act was going to give a lot of trouble, and possibly a lot of work to valuers and to lawyers, but on the whole he did not think the lawyers would get much out of it. The problem would be dealt with by the local surveyor, an expert valuer called in from outside, and the landowner. A reasonable clerk to a local authority, a good surveyor, and if possible an independent valuer, would solve the compensation problems, and the law would not have many pickings out of the Act. There had been very few cases under the old Act, and he doubted whether many would go to the High Court under the new Act.

The whole subject of town and country planning was full of difficulties and snags. He had recently seen a book written by a very ingenious man—he believed a lawyer—who put in tabular form the various stages to be gone through under the Town and Country Planning Act from the first time the scheme was thought of until it passed the final stage when it became a portion of the law of the land. The writer managed to find no less than 102 different stages.

Mr. MAYNARD TOMSON (Fellow) said he had come to the meeting in a quandary, and was still in a quandary with regard to the question of interim development, to which most of the speakers had referred. Barristers and others interested in the law had said that it was imperative to appeal to get any satisfaction, but so far no speaker had referred to Mr. Rosevear's remarks with regard to appeals to the Minister. He was dealing at present with a local case where an interim development order was being asked for, but according to Mr. Rosevear a matter of fifty to a hundred guineas was usually involved, and he did not think it worth while appealing to the Minister. In the case to which he referred, the compensation, which was for the loss of two plots of building land, would probably come to £300 or £400, and he was wondering whether he should follow Mr. Gerald Eve's advice and appeal straight to the Minister or try to have a round table conference beforehand. It seemed to him that Mr. Rosevear's remarks made it very difficult if it was desired to appeal to the Minister. He had studied Section 10 (4), and was under the impression that the word "contribution" might be interpreted "something on "account of preliminary expenses involved in complying with "the scheme, which expenses would not otherwise have been "necessary." Any question of compensation for land eventually taken and/or injurious affection might be dealt with at a later date.

Mr. P. W. MACFARLANE (Professional Associate), referring to the control of elevations, agreed with Professor Adshead that the powers set out in the new Act, as amplified in the Model Clauses, were not really satisfactory, and that a town planning scheme must be positive and should do more than prevent serious outrage. It should be of assistance in the general betterment of the design of elevation of all buildings. There was nothing so bad to-day as the incursion of the speculative builder into rural areas, and powers should be given to refuse plans for elevations which were out of harmony with the existing surroundings or existing buildings, such harmony to take into account questions of traditional architecture and the type of materials in actual use in the area. He sincerely hoped that power to control elevations would be exercised in industrial areas. He regarded that as most important to-day, when one considered that the tendency was for industrial areas to extend along the main roads and especially along arterial roads, where the buildings were in positions of great prominence. If left uncontrolled one could imagine a certain degree of chaos would result, and the entrances to big towns, which were to some extent satisfactory where the elevations of factories were controlled, might be far otherwise without such control.

The control of the height of buildings was interesting, and in cases where there was a vacant plot of land in a row of houses and a plan was sent in for a bungalow he hoped there would be power to say no to that and to insist on a house. He did not know, however, that he agreed altogether with the suggestion that the size of buildings should be co-ordinated with the density. It had been suggested that where there was a density of, say, four houses to the acre a minimum size of buildings should be imposed. That might mean that those who could not afford relatively expensive buildings would have to live in the town, and he did not think that was reasonable. At present buildings costing £300 or £400 were being erected in the low density zones at a considerable distance from urbanised centres.

With regard to the suggestion that power to impose sight lines might be used to control the siting of telephone kiosks, &c., he did not think that was probable, as there was a clause in the Model Clauses which protected undertakings in the carrying out of their statutory duties.

He would be interested to hear the reply to the discussion on the question of areas where development was prohibited on account of liability to flood. It was quite likely that one day such land would have such a high value that it would be worth while undertaking extensive drainage works, and if a permanent prohibition had been imposed it might be creating difficulties. The Act said: " permanently prohibits or restricts," and it should be possible to frame a clause which would restrict development so far as injury to health was concerned, leaving it to the owner to erect buildings if he could suitably drain the land or otherwise make it fit for development.

The hope had been expressed that restrictions on the use of land would make it unlikely that cemeteries and sewage disposal works would be situated in undesirable positions. He did not think the Act would be much of a safeguard in that respect, because the town planning authority was usually the authority which would require the land for a cemetery or sewage disposal works. Where he hoped provisions restricting the use of land would be useful was in stopping the use of land in a residential area for, say, a greyhound racing track or in preventing large areas being used for slag heaps or dumps for scrap metal and broken-down motor-cars, such as one saw along some of the arterial roads to-day.

Where a building had been demolished or burned down it was permissible to erect a building of the same cubic content or superficial area in the case of business premises, but he wondered what would happen where there had been a density of 24 to the acre in a 12 to the acre zone. It would be permissible to erect a building of the same cubic content, but could one have a density of 24 to the acre? It might be the density would have to conform to 12 to the acre. He would be interested to have Mr. Rosevear's opinion on that point.

Mr. W. R. JENKINS (Fellow) thought it was perhaps unfortunate that Mr. Rosevear had included in his numbered headings two matters which were really distinct—the things which might be included in schemes, and the things in respect of which compensation might be excluded by a scheme. For example, under heading No. 10 Mr. Rosevear said: " The town planning " authority can fix a line beyond which no building in a street or " proposed street may project if for any part of a period of five " years preceding the ' material date ' it did not form the site " of, or part of the site of, a building." A little further on he said: " Building lines can therefore be laid down for all vacant " sites (provided that they have been vacant for five years)." The fact was, of course, that building lines could be prescribed on any land, whether built on or vacant, and all future buildings could be made to conform to the line laid down as they came to be rebuilt ; but, if there was a building on the site at any time in the five years referred to, the scheme could not exclude compensation if the rebuilding must conform to a line and damage resulted. From what appeared on the next page it was obvious that Mr. Rosevear realised that, but the wording of the sentence quoted did open the way to misunderstanding.

Mr. Rosevear went on to make the surprising statement, at the bottom of page 229, that the building line provision was intended to protect " building sites which have become sites "—which he understood to mean " have become vacant sites "—within the five years, and that when sites of that nature arose after the material date no compensation would be payable. He understood Mr. Rosevear to mean by that that if a building which was in existence at the material date was pulled down after that date, no compensation would be payable if a new building was made to conform to a building line prescribed by the scheme. He did not see how Section 19 could possibly be construed in that way. It seemed clear that if there was a building on the site at any time within the five years prior to the material date, compensation would be payable if the building was pulled down and the new building had to conform to a line prescribed under the scheme, and it was immaterial whether the building was pulled down before or after the material date. It was only in the case where the site was vacant throughout the five years that compensation might be excluded by the scheme, and then not if the building line so prescribed would make the site less suitable for building.

On page 236, again dealing with the building line, but under the heading " How and when claims may be made," Mr. Rosevear said: " There is an exception with regard to ' building line ' " provisions, which it is important to bear in mind. Provided " that the site was actually occupied by a building for two years " prior to the ' material date,' a claim arising from a building " line provision for injurious affection may be made within twelve " months after the erection of the ' new ' building which " conforms to the line laid down." Personally he agreed with every word of that, but if Mr. Rosevear's previous contention had been sound, no claim could possibly be made for that building, and therefore there would be no point at all in extending the time within which the claim might be made.

The surveyor who had studied the various Papers which had been read on the Act during the last year or so with care would know all there was to be known about appeals to the Minister and claims for compensation and betterment, and would be, in fact, well prepared for war. But was he prepared for peace? He would like to read a few short extracts from the Ministry of Health circular letter on the subject of co-operation:—

"The Act requires that schemes should be prepared in "co-operation with the persons interested in the land proposed to "be included. The Ministry have always emphasised that the "closest co-operation of this kind is essential for the best results." "The Minister wishes to stress that the consultation should be "undertaken from the very earliest stages, and suggests that "before the matter is made public by advertisement the "authority should submit their proposals to the owners in "advance, as it is unwise that the owners should first hear of "the proposals through the local Press where their interests are "affected, and that given such frank consultation from the start "in a reasonable spirit of give and take the preparation of a "satisfactory scheme will be materially facilitated, and questions "of compensation wholly removed or much reduced." The Minister went on to say that more consultation was needed with representatives of industry and commerce. "The scheme is above "all a business proposition, and this cannot be too strongly "emphasised." Later the Minister said that there were very many ways in which the town planner could help estate developers. The authority, he said, should not be content with an attitude of negation, aimed at preventing what was injurious to the community, but should be constructive, helping developers to plan their lands.

Personally he hoped that local authorities would act in accordance with the Minister's recommendations, and that landowners and their surveyors would be ready to help the town planner with constructive proposals. He suggested that the primary duty of the surveyor was not the making of appeals to the Minister, nor the making of compensation claims, important though those things were, but to co-operate in a ready and willing way with the town planner with the object of removing the necessity of appeals to the Minister and the necessity of claims for compensation or claims for betterment. It was only by that co-operation, as the Minister said, that a really satisfactory scheme of town planning could be achieved.

Sufficient attention was perhaps not being given to the constructive side of town planning. One did not hear much at The Chartered Surveyors' Institution or other institutions of the practical methods which estate developers used in conferences with local authorities and in the many problems which arose in their practice, but one heard much more on matters which arose when agreement could not be arrived at. He thought there must be a wealth of information available from those with experience of practical estate development in areas which were town planned and which could be made available to others. It was to that which he referred when he asked if surveyors were prepared for peace.

The PRESIDENT then put the vote of thanks to the authors, which was carried with acclamation. It was intimated that owing to the lateness of the hour they would reply to the discussion in writing.

The following written replies have been received:—

From Mr. D. M. LAWRANCE—

The discussion has, I think, emphasised the number of difficulties, both legal and practical, which await solution under the Act.

Mr. Gerald Eve referred to the case of an owner who enters into an agreement with a responsible authority under Section 34 in consideration of his land being left out of a town planning scheme. I entirely agree that he can have no right to compensation under Section 18. Since his land is outside the scheme, his legal rights cannot be " infringed or curtailed " by its provisions. Whether he may still be liable to a claim for betterment would seem to depend on whether the words of Section 21 are wide enough to extend even to property outside the area of the scheme.

Mr. A. M. Trustram Eve suggested that the words " any " property " in Section 21 must probably be taken to mean " any " property within the ambit of the scheme," on the ground that, if betterment were to apply outside the scheme, injurious affection must do so also. With respect I venture to differ from him on this point. The scope of the claim for injurious affection is limited by the fact that the legal rights of the owner must be infringed or curtailed. The scheduling of property within a scheme for a particular purpose cannot affect the legal rights of an owner whose land is outside the area of the scheme, although he may conceivably suffer injurious affection. But I think the very general words of Section 21 may quite possibly make him liable to a claim if his property is bettered.

Until this point is decided, it would seem that an owner who enters into an agreement under Section 34 would be well advised to make the exclusion of betterment one of the express terms of it.

Mr. Stephen Chart's letter and the case quoted by Mr. Thorpe emphasise a very real defect in the compensation provisions of the Act, namely, that the right to claim for loss during the interim period exists only if and when the owner establishes a right to compensation for injurious affection upon the scheme coming into operation. Even then it depends upon an appeal against restrictions on interim development having previously been made to the Ministry.

In the case quoted by Mr. Chart I can find no escape from the conclusion that, if the owner is unable to show that his property is injuriously affected by the coming into operation of the scheme, he will have no claim for loss suffered during the interim period.

The case quoted by Mr. Hayley Mason appears to be one in which the express provisions of the scheme may, under Section 19, exclude the right to compensation. The only remedy would seem to be an appeal to the Ministry to permit the proposed development.

In conclusion I should like to express my thanks to the proposer and seconder of the vote of thanks and other gentlemen taking part in the discussion for their very kind references to my Paper, and to Mr. Rosevear for making the task of collaborating with him such an easy and pleasant one.

From Mr. JOHN A. ROSEVEAR—

I think that we can congratulate The Institution upon the excellent discussion which took place and which ventilated many useful points. My thanks are due to those taking part in the discussion for the very kind expressions of appreciation of my Paper, which I trust will be found to be useful in the every-day practical working out of schemes.

With Mr. C. Gerald Eve's contention I thoroughly agree that it is most important to remember that no claim for injurious affection can be sustained unless the owner's legal rights are infringed or curtailed. Mr. Reginald Poole stressed co-operation between the landowner and the town planning authority, and with this I heartily agree. A round table discussion of the difficulties of both sides frequently ends in a large measure of agreement and obviates appeals. Mr. Poole mentioned the alterations and additions allowed under a scheme for " built-up " areas. Clause 54 of the Provisional Model Clauses allows alterations since the " material date," which do not involve the demolition of the building to the extent of more than one-half of the superficial area of its main containing walls. Extensions to existing buildings, similarly, may be allowed if they do not exceed more than oneeighth of the existing floor space within the main containing walls. This clause applies only to buildings existing at the material date and not to those erected between the material date and the coming into operation of the scheme.

No doubt Professor Adshead's contention, that a tribunal set up under a scheme to deal with control of design can only, strictly legally, approve or disapprove plans put before them, is correct, but if I may speak from my own experience I would say that a certain tribunal for an urban district, upon which I have the honour to serve as the representative of The Institution, has taken up a different attitude, which, I think, would commend itself to the Professor. In several instances informal meetings have been held with the appellants, suggestions put forward before them for an improvement of the design, which in most cases have been accepted, and, unofficially, the matter has been settled in this way, the resultant approval of the design, as amended, having certainly been to the advantage of the particular locality. Again a case where co-operation can be of great benefit.

Mr. A. M. Trustram Eve made a very valuable contribution to the discussion and strongly reinforces the necessity of prosecuting appeals to protect rights to compensation. With regard to the right to claim "betterment" from an owner whose land is "outside" the area of the particular scheme, no doubt Mr. Trustram Eve's contention is "good law." The point of inequality arises, however, for you may have two separate ownerships both benefiting from the same provision in the scheme or works carried out, e.g., a new main road or a public open space, but one person's land is within the particular scheme and the other just outside—the open space might form the boundary of the scheme—and it would merely be just that both who benefit should be liable for a claim for betterment and not the one owner who is inside. Did the Act contemplate a case such as this?

With regard to Mr. W. F. Thorpe's claim for compensation owing to the imposition of a building line, it is clear that no compensation can be claimed prior to the final approval of the scheme, but a contribution might be made by the town planning authority. It would be wise for him to consider the sage remarks of Mr. C. Gerald Eve in this respect. In reply to his query regarding control of elevations his only redress is to put forward an appeal to the Minister of Health.

I should like to congratulate both Mr. W. Hayley Mason and Mr. R. W. MacFarlane on their excellent contributions, and to remind the former that no compensation is payable for "character "zoning" provided that the Minister approves of the provisions of the particular scheme. His only step is to appeal to the Minister and endeavour to show the need for shops. I largely agree with

Mr. Macfarlane's remarks with regard to the necessity of controlling the elevations of industrial buildings, and certainly so where they are situate on main roads and in prominent positions. Also with his views respecting land liable to flooding. It should be possible to prepare a clause to cover his point, which might be inserted in the Model Clauses, with an appeal to the Minister against refusal of the town planning authority to allow development when the danger to health has been obviated.

With regard to his remarks respecting "minimum" size, I must still disagree. I contend that this control is necessary, and especially in low density areas of good class types of development. His point with regard to the future density of demolished "business" buildings was interesting, but he must remember that control of shopping and business areas as regards density has not usually been tightly exercised as in "residential" areas, and the Provisional Model Clauses appear to contemplate a much greater proportion of site to be occupied by such classes of buildings than the existing Model Clauses.

Mr. Maynard Tomson seems to have misunderstood my remarks regarding appeals and the cost of same. May I point out that there is nothing to prevent any member of this Institution conducting such an appeal, provided that he has made himself conversant with the Act and procedure. I did, however, state that in some cases it was important and most desirable to obtain expert legal assistance.

Mr. W. R. Jenkins in his useful contribution brings me back to the straight and narrow path when my imagination runs away with me and allows me to see more stringent control with regard to "building lines," without compensation, than the Act warrants. I thank him for his timely correction. I must, however, remind my fellow-members that there is an important proviso missing from Mr. Jenkins' words when he states that compensation cannot be excluded "if the building line so prescribed would "make the site less suitable for building," the proviso being that the erection of buildings must be "in conformity with the pro-"visions of the scheme." As pointed out in my Paper, such allowed buildings may be very different as regards density, height and proportion of site occupied by buildings. With Mr. Jenkins' remarks on co-operation I emphatically agree, and this has been stressed by the Minister for several years past. How helpful it would be if local authorities, generally, would take more heed of the Minister's words.

May I again express, both to Dr. Maxwell for his very kind references, and to all taking part, my sincere thanks, and say how greatly I have appreciated the advantage and pleasure of collaboration with Mr. David M. Lawrance.

THE LAND DRAINAGE ACT, 1930.

By F. M. Farmer, M.B.E., LL.B. (Solicitor),
Clerk to the River Ouse (Yorks.) Catchment Board.

INTRODUCTORY.

The Land Drainage Act, 1930, was the outcome of a series of recommendations of a Royal Commission appointed in 1927, whose terms of reference were "to "enquire into the present law relating to land drainage in "England and Wales, and its administration throughout "the country, to consider and report whether any amend- "ment of the law is needed to secure an efficient system of "arterial drainage without any undue burdens being placed "on any particular section of the community, and to make "recommendations having regard to all the interests "concerned."

The Act embodies several new principles which cannot properly be appreciated without some idea of what the state of affairs was when the Commission was set up.

It is proposed, therefore, before passing on to a consideration of the Act itself to indicate the position of land drainage matters generally from the legal and administrative points of view before the passing of the Act.

The more one delves into the history of land drainage in this country the more one is amazed at the manner in which such an important subject has been treated. A rough idea can be gathered from the report of the Royal Commission who, after conducting a thorough investigation, were constrained to place on record that they found that the administration of arterial drainage was conducted by a confused tangle of authorities established by the piecemeal legislation of 500 years and exercising a great variety of powers and functions with no uniformity of method or liability.

The types of Drainage Authority in existence were:—

(a) Commissioners of Sewers, of whom there were 49;

(b) Elective Drainage Boards, of whom there were 114; and

(c) Drainage Authorities under special Acts, of whom there were 198.

The principal weaknesses in the existing law and administration of land drainage to which the Royal Commission drew attention may be briefly summarised as follows:—

1. Constitution of Drainage Districts.

This was wholly unsatisfactory. There was no machinery in existence for ensuring that any area which was in need of drainage should be brought within a drainage district.

Even when a Commission of Sewers was appointed, in many cases the area over which the Commissioners were to exercise jurisdiction was undefined. Though matters in this respect were improved when a drainage district was formed under the Land Drainage Act, 1861, as the boundaries of the district could be more precisely laid down, it was only possible to form a district under this Act if the area to be dealt with came within the following description, viz.: "Any bog, moor, or other area of land that requires " a combined system of drainage, warping or irrigation." This rendered it practically impossible to set up a drainage district for the catchment area of a river.

2. Constitution of Drainage Authorities.

Commissioners of Sewers were appointed by the Crown and generally held office for life. It was not until 1861 that provision was made for the setting up of Drainage Authorities on an elective basis.

Whether any drainage authority was set up or not depended on whether anyone in a particular district thought it worth while to set the ball rolling. There was no compulsion on the Crown to issue a Commission of Sewers even though moved to do so. Similarly, no authority could be set up under the Land Drainage Act, 1861, unless a petition was presented by the proprietors of not less than one-tenth of the area concerned, and provided that the owners of two-thirds of the area were in favour of it. Finally, no one, of course, could be compelled to promote a Private Bill.

The setting up of authorities was thus a matter of chance, there being no legislative requirement that when one was needed it should be formed. Notwithstanding this, no fewer than 381 authorities having all sorts of constitutions, powers and functions sprang up in a haphazard fashion all over the country, none of them having any relation to any of the others. Indeed, the Royal Commission reported that nothing had struck them more in the course of their enquiry than " the revelation of the complete mutual independence " of the various drainage authorities over the country. They " appear to carry out their work without any regard to the " operations of any other authority above or below them on " the same stream, with the result that not only is the work " of one authority often rendered abortive by the neglect of " other authorities, but much money is spent in an uneco- " nomic and wasteful manner which, if it were expended " under a well-regulated scheme involving the co-operation " of all authorities in a particular catchment area, would " have a most beneficial influence on that area."

3. Rating.

In this respect, as in others, the greatest diversity was to be found. In some cases the drainage rate was payable by the owner ; in others by the occupier. In some areas land only was rated; in others, every kind of hereditament.

In some cases rateable value was arrived at on the same principles as the rateable value for poor rate; in other cases improved value was attempted to be arrived at in various ways.

All Drainage Authorities, however, existing by virtue of public general legislation, were bound by the legal interpretation which was placed on certain words in the Statute of Sewers, 1531, to the effect that drainage rates could not be charged on any person who did not benefit or avoid danger as a result of the drainage works in respect of which the drainage rates were made. In other words, the principle of drainage rating—" no benefit, no rate "—was held to mean some definite and actual benefit or profit to the land itself. It can be imagined what differing constructions were put on this principle by local courts when the payment of drainage rates was resisted on the ground that no benefit had been received.

Moreover, drainage authorities themselves were nonplussed in endeavouring to arrive at a conclusion whether their operation benefited particular land or not. In any event, however extensive the area of benefit might be taken to be, it usually proved utterly inadequate for rating purposes without either levying a rate of such magnitude as to cripple the resources of the landowner or requiring him to pay drainage rates amounting to more than the land was worth.

In their report the Royal Commission stated that the two principal points which had emerged from their investigation as to the basis of any amendment to drainage law were—

(a) the necessity of having a supreme authority in each catchment area which should be in charge of the main channel and banks of the river and work in closest collaboration with the drainage authorities concerned with the internal drainage of the catchment area ; and

(b) the prime importance of the extension of the area of and alteration in the basis of rating for drainage > purposes, in order to include a much wider area and basis of contribution than could be brought in under the old interpretation of the principle of "benefit."

To achieve these objects, to remove anomalies, secure reasonable uniformity and provide for efficient administration and equitable distribution of liability the Land Drainage Act of 1930 was enacted.

THE ACT.

The Act is drawn on broad lines and applies to England and Wales only, except such part of the administrative County of London as is not for the time being within the Lee Catchment Area. Nothing in the Act is to affect the rights and properties of the London County Council.

It is a consolidating Act and repeals practically the whole of the public general legislation relating to land drainage from the Statute of Sewers of 1531 down to the Land Drainage Act, 1929, both inclusive.

It will tend to simplify matters in considering the Act if it is borne in mind that it deals with and provides for—

(a) Two kinds of Drainage Districts:
  (i.) Catchment Areas ;
  (ii.) Internal Drainage Districts.

(b) Two kinds of Drainage Authorities:
  (i.) Catchment Boards ;
  (ii.) Internal Drainage Boards.

(c) Two kinds of Watercourses:
  (i.) Main Rivers ;
  (ii.) Every other kind of passage (natural or artificial) through which water flows.

(d) Two kinds of contributions from local rating sources:
  (i.) Precepts based on rateable values ;
  (ii.) Rates based on annual values.

(e) Two kinds of property for rating purposes:

(i.) Agricultural Land ;
(ii.) Other Lands and Hereditaments.

In exercising their functions drainage authorities must have regard to the interests of various public undertakings such as those carried on by local, navigation, harbour, conservancy, water and electricity authorities and to certain railway works; and may do nothing which would injuriously affect such interests without the consent of the undertakers. Moreover, in the exercise of the powers conferred by the Drainage Act due regard is to be had to fishery interests.

The first thing the Act does is to provide for the creation of drainage districts and authorities by dealing with the watersheds of the rivers of the country and making them into drainage districts known as catchment areas and providing for each of such areas an authority known as the catchment board.

In addition, provision is made for there to be other drainage districts, namely, such areas as will derive benefit or avoid danger as a result of drainage operations. These are known as internal drainage districts and in charge of each is an internal drainage board.

This is the first time in English history that there has been any attempt to secure that the land drainage of the country shall be provided for in a systematic and statesmanlike way, and for the first time the rivers of the country were brought under the jurisdiction of a drainage authority. Up to 1930 it may be said, generally speaking, that it was nobody's job to look after a river from the land drainage point of view.

CATCHMENT AREAS AND BOARDS.

A catchment area is the area the drainage of which is directed to a particular river or arterial drain.

There are 47 catchment areas scheduled to the Act, and the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries is empowered by Order to add to the number. For each such area the Minister is required to make an Order setting up a catchment board.

Catchment boards are constituted by Order made by the Minister, and consists of such number of members, not being more than 31, as the Minister may determine, and are appointed as follows:—

(a) one member is appointed by the Minister ;

(b) such number not being less than two-thirds of the remaining members as the Minister may determine are appointed, whether from their own members or not, by the councils of the counties and county boroughs whose area or any part of whose area is situate within the catchment area ;

(c) the residue of the members are appointed by the Minister after consultation with and after taking into consideration nominations by the internal drainage boards whose districts are within the catchment area to represent those boards, and that portion if any of the catchment area for which drainage boards might be but have not been constituted under the Act.

The Minister decides in detail the number of members to be appointed by the counties and county boroughs, having regard to the estimated amounts of the contributions to be made by them towards the expenses of the Board, and in no case can the members to be appointed by the county borough councils exceed one-half of the aggregate of the members to be appointed by the councils of counties and county boroughs.

The catchment board having been duly constituted is furnished by the Minister with an official map of the catchment area, upon which is marked in a distinctive colour that part of the channel of the river which is to be treated as the main river for the purposes of the Act, and also the watercourses which are to be deemed part of the main river.

Within the limits of this Paper it is not possible to go into detail, so it must serve to say that the powers, duties and functions of a catchment board may be divided roughly into two classes:—

(1) As an executive body so far as the main river is concerned ;

(2) As an administrative body, including the exercise of a general supervision over all matters relating to the drainage of land within the catchment area.

With regard to drainage works generally, the powers of drainage authorities are set out in Section 34 of the Act and are grouped under three heads:—

(a) To maintain existing works, that is to say, to cleanse, repair, or otherwise maintain in a due state of efficiency any existing watercourse or drainage work ;

(b) To improve any existing works, that is to say, to deepen, widen, straighten or otherwise improve any existing watercourse, or remove milldams, weirs, or other obstructions to watercourses, or raise, widen or otherwise improve any existing drainage work ;

(c) To construct new works, that is to say, to make any new watercourse or drainage work or erect any machinery or do any other act not hereinbefore referred to required for the drainage of the area comprised within their district.

Then follows a proviso to the effect that a catchment board shall not by virtue only of this section be deemed to be authorised to do any work otherwise than in relation to the main river.

The section then goes on to say that where injury is sustained by any person by reason of the exercise by a drainage board of any of its powers under this section, the board shall be liable to make full compensation to the injured person, to be settled in case of dispute by arbitration.

It is also declared that nothing in the section authorises any person to enter on the land of any person except for the purpose of maintaining existing works.

By Section 6 of the Act the powers conferred by the Act on drainage boards are, so far as concerns the main river including the banks thereof and drainage works in connection with the main river, to be exercised solely by the catchment board. Conversely the catchment board is not authorised, except under certain circumstances (e.g., exercising the powers of internal drainage boards in default), to engage in any other kind of drainage work.

It should be pointed out here that there is nothing in this section to impose any duty on a catchment board to carry out any particular drainage work on the main river.

It may, however, become the duty of the catchment board to do main river works under any of the foregoing circumstances:—

(a) By Section 4 (1) (a) of the Act the catchment board is required to prepare and submit to the Minister for his approval a scheme for the transfer to the catchment board of all such rights, powers, duties, obligations and liabilities (including liabilities incurred in connection with works) over or in connection with the main river as were immediately before the commencement of the Act vested in or to be discharged by any drainage authority and of any property held by the authority for the purpose of or in connection with any functions so transferred.

If therefore there was a liability to do any main river work on any drainage authority which is so transferred to the catchment board it will become the catchment board's liability to do such work.

(b) By Section 9 of the Act it is the duty of every catchment board to take steps for the commutation of all obligations imposed on persons by reason of tenure, custom, prescription or otherwise to do any work in connection with the main river.

To establish an obligation is not so easy as it sounds. Should a catchment board, however, succeed in commuting a liability, it will obviously become their duty to carry out and maintain the works in respect of which such liability was commuted.

(c) By Section 12 of the Act, on complaint being made to the Minister by the council of any county, county borough or county district, or by any internal drainage board that a catchment board have failed to exercise any of the powers conferred on the board for the purpose of maintaining the main river in a due state of efficiency which they ought to have exercised, the Minister may give such directions in the matter as in the circumstances of the case appear to him to be proper, and it would then become the duty of the catchment board to comply with the directions so given.

Difficulties arise from time to time in deciding whether any particular work is " a drainage work in connection with " a main river," particularly in view of the definition of " banks " in the Act, Section 81 of which provides as follows:—

> "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say:—
> 'Banks' mean banks, walls or embankments adjoining or confining, or constructed for the purposes of or in connection with any channel or sea front, and includes all land between the bank and low-water mark."
> [Here follow several other definitions.]

In the River Ouse (Yorks.) Catchment Area, and, it is presumed, in other catchment areas also, there are several miles of barrier banks which have doubtless been constructed " for the purposes of or in connection with " certain channels, but are many miles distant from the channel. One cannot deny they are banks, but one hesitates to come to the conclusion that all the intervening miles between them and the channel is also bank.

In the event of any question arising as to whether any work is a drainage work in connection with the main river, it may be referred to the Minister for his decision.

Another matter of practical difficulty which often arises is to decide whether any work proposed to be done is " maintenance " or " improvement," because there is no standard to which to work. When does maintenance merge into improvement?

It is important to be clear about this because the drainage board can enter on land without the owner's consent to carry out maintenance works, but must obtain consent for works of improvement (or new works).

It is further important to the catchment board if they have their eye on a possible Government grant, because no grant can be paid in respect of maintenance works. It is equally important from the point of view of an internal drainage board because if the work is maintenance it is a charge on the occupiers of the district, whereas if it is improvement the cost will, though payable in the first place by the occupier, be recoverable by him from the owner.

It may be mentioned here that by Section 32 of the Act where it appears to a local authority that the execution or maintenance by a drainage board of any drainage works is desirable in the interests of the public health of any area situated in the district of the local authority or for the protection or better enjoyment of any highway, the local authority may contribute to the expenses of the drainage board ; and by Section 6 (4) a catchment board may enter into an agreement with the council of any borough or urban district or with any navigation authority for the carrying out by the council or authority on agreed terms of any work on the main river which the catchment board are authorised to carry out. Why the catchment board cannot enter into such an agreement with a county or rural council, seeing that the main river, for the most part, flows through the rural areas of a county, is not apparent. Moreover, why should not internal drainage boards have power to enter into agreements with local authorities?

What exactly is the position of the catchment board in regard to supervision is not made clear in the Act.

Section 1 (3) of the Act provides that, subject to the provisions of the Act, a drainage board shall exercise a general supervision over all matters relating to the drainage of land within its district, and shall have such other powers and perform such other duties as are conferred or imposed on drainage boards by the Acts.

The only other place in the Act that the writer has been able to find anything about supervision is Section 7, which reads as follows:—

> " A catchment board shall exercise a general supervision with respect to the drainage of the catchment area, and may for the purpose of securing the efficient working and maintenance of existing drainage works within the catchment area and the construction of such new drainage works as may be necessary, give such general or special directions as they consider reasonable for the guidance of the internal drainage boards with respect to the exercise and performance by those boards of their powers and duties as such."

The question arises—does Section 7 cut down the general power and duties of supervision apparently conferred and imposed by Section 1?

There are two distinct views as to this.

The common-sense view would appear to be that it does not; that Section 7 (1) begins with a clear statement that " a catchment board shall exercise a general supervision " with respect to the drainage of the catchment area," and then goes on to give them permissive powers to give directions to internal drainage boards for the purpose of securing the efficient working and maintenance of existing drainage works and the construction of such new drainage works as may be necessary.

On the other hand it is arguable that in reading a section one must at least read on to the first full stop, and that one is not entitled to stop at a comma and regard such part as an absolute statement. From this point of view the second half of Section 7 (1) may be held to be explanatory of the opening words and indicative of the sort of supervision that is meant.

In this connection it may be that the marginal note is important. The marginal note is "Supervision of internal drainage boards and districts."

In the recent case of Rex v. Hare (98 J. P., 49) the Court of Criminal Appeal had occasion to consider whether the heading to a group of sections in an Act had any bearing on the interpretation of one of those sections, and Mr. Justice Avory, in his judgment, said: "The heading of a group of sections, as is well known, forms no part of the enactment ; it is not voted on or passed in Parliament. Headings and marginal notes are inserted only after a Bill has become law. A heading cannot control the plain meaning of the enacting part of the section. It may, in some instances, be looked at as a preamble if there is some ambiguity in the meaning of the section on which it can throw light."

In the present case it might be argued that there is some ambiguity and that therefore one is entitled to turn to the marginal note for light, in which case it might be held that the supervisory powers and duties of the catchment board were confined to internal drainage districts and boards.

At the same time one cannot help feeling that it is consistent with the general tenor of the Land Drainage Act that the catchment board should exercise a general supervision in its area, because, among other things, if they cannot, nobody else can.

However, even if the Act is read in this way it does not carry one very much further, because there is nothing in the Act to enable the catchment board to enforce or make effective such supervision.

It is a further weakness in the Act that any directions which may be given to an internal board are not enforceable by any specific sanction. There are, however, certain courses open to a catchment board whose directions are disregarded, under Sections 10 and 11 of the Act.

Under Section 10, where, in the opinion of a catchment board, any land in the catchment area is injured or likely to be injured by flooding or inadequate drainage which might be remedied wholly or partially by the exercise of drainage powers which are vested in any internal drainage board and which are not being exercised, the catchment board may exercise all or any of those powers. This sounds all right until it is remembered that any expense so incurred by the catchment board has to be recovered by them by levying a rate over the internal drainage district, and that the cost of the levying and collecting such a rate might easily greatly exceed the cost of doing the work.

The other alternative open to the catchment board is to present a petition to the Minister to take over the powers and duties of the internal board in their entirety and become themselves the internal board.

Neither of these courses is suitable in many cases, and it would obviously be a useful amendment to the Act if, on carrying out the powers of any internal drainage board in default, the catchment board were empowered to charge them with the cost and if necessary recover it from them summarily as a civil debt.

On its administrative side the catchment board has a multitude of duties to perform, the chief of which may perhaps be said to be the preparation of and submission to the Minister of schemes for effecting (inter alia) the following objects:—

(1) The transfer of main river powers before referred to;

(2) The constitution of new internal drainage districts and boards within the area;

(3) The alteration of the boundaries of any internal district;

(4) The amalgamation of the whole or any part of any internal drainage district with any other such district;

(5) The abolition of all Commissioners of Sewers;

(6) The making of alterations in local Acts or Awards in land drainage interests.

Every catchment area is divided into what may be described as upland and lowland areas, the latter being the area which is suitable to be brought within internal drainage districts as being areas which will derive benefit or avoid danger as a result of drainage operations, and for the guidance of catchment boards the Minister furnishes them with maps indicating such lowland area.

In order that the full benefit of the Act may be obtained in this respect it is very necessary that there should be some paramount authority to insure that suitable districts are formed and that the authorities in charge of those districts should be subject to the general supervision of the paramount authority.

This can only be brought about by the catchment board surveying its lowland area and taking the necessary action to bring it within appropriate internal drainage districts and keeping a watchful eye on the administration of such districts and, where necessary, giving, as they are empowered to do, such general or special directions as they consider reasonable for their guidance.

Amongst the other powers and duties of the catchment board may be mentioned the following:—

1. Under Section 8 they have power to submit to the Minister schemes for revoking, varying or amending any provisions of any award made under any public or local Act which in any manner affects or relates to land drainage.

2. Under Section 9 it is their duty to take steps for the commutation of all obligations imposed on persons by reason of tenure, custom, prescription or otherwise to do any work in connection with the main river.

3. By Section 15 they may promote or oppose Bills in Parliament and apply for or oppose applications for Provisional Orders or other statutory Orders.

4. By Section 64 it is not lawful for any person except by way of replacement or reconstruction of an existing bridge to construct a bridge over the main river of a catchment area without the consent (not to be unreasonably withheld) of the catchment board and unless the bridge is constructed in accordance with plans and sections approved by them.

In common with all drainage authorities under the Act they have the following powers:—

1. By Section 38, without making payment therefor or giving compensation in respect thereof, they may appropriate and dispose of any shingle, sand, clay, gravel, stone, rock or other matter removed in the course of the execution of any work for widening, deepening or dredging any watercourse, and may deposit any matter so removed on the banks of the watercourse.

2. They may take action under Sections 40 to 42 for transfer to themselves of powers and duties of navigation authorities including the obtaining of powers to levy navigation tolls in certain cases.

3. By Section 44 it is not lawful for any person to erect any milldam, weir or other like obstruction to the flow of any watercourse or to raise or otherwise alter any such obstruction whether erected before or after the commencement of the Act in any drainage district without the consent in writing (not to be unreasonably withheld) of the drainage board.

The question has been raised under this section as to what authority is to enforce it in the case of an obstruction to a watercourse which is neither a main river nor within an internal drainage district.

4. By Section 36 they may proceed to enforce obligations to repair watercourses, bridges, &c.

5. By Section 45 they may buy, sell or exchange land.

6. By Section 46 they may borrow money.

7. By Section 47 they may make by-laws.

In practice the expenses of the catchment board are met by them by means of precepts issued to internal drainage boards and the councils of the counties and county boroughs situated wholly or partially within the catchment area.

In introducing the Land Drainage Bill into Parliament the then Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries intimated that the revenues of a catchment board would be derivable from two sources, namely, rates and national contributions, and the Act is drawn on these lines by enacting—

(a) that the Minister may out of moneys provided by Parliament make grants towards the expenditure incurred by catchment boards under the Act in the improvement of existing works or the construction of new works of such amounts as the Treasury may from time to time sanction;

(b) that the Catchment Board shall by resolution require each internal drainage board to make towards the expenses of the catchment board such contribution as the catchment board may consider to be fair;

(c) that the expenses of the catchment board in so far as they are not met otherwise shall be paid to the board by the councils of the counties and county boroughs situated wholly or partially within the catchment area.

In deciding what precept to issue on an internal drainage board the catchment board must take into consideration all relevant factors to enable them to make up their mind what they consider to be fair, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and the precept may be to any amount.

In the case, however, of precepts to be issued to the councils of counties and county boroughs the question of the merits of the case does not enter into it, and all counties and county boroughs must be served with the same precept, i.e., to pay to the catchment board such an amount as would be produced by a stated rate in the pound levied on that part of the county or county borough which is within the catchment area.

By an ordinary majority the catchment board may decide to precept the councils of the counties and county boroughs with a precept not exceeding the estimated amount which would be produced by a rate of two pence in the pound. If, however, the majority of those members of the catchment board who are appointed by the councils of the counties and county boroughs consent, the precept may be to any amount.

Owing to the derating provisions of the Local Government Act, 1929, no contribution to the catchment board's expenses is payable in respect of agricultural land unless such land happens to be within an internal drainage district which is precepted by the catchment board.

It is to be noted that it was not a recommendation of the Royal Commission that the catchment board should precept internal drainage boards. What the Royal Commission did recommend was that the catchment board should be empowered to make contributions to the funds of internal drainage authorities. This recommendation is incorporated in the Act, and it is provided that where it appears to an internal drainage board that, by reason of the quantity of water which their district receives from lands at a higher level, or by reason of the time which will elapse before their district obtains any relief from the operations of the catchment board on the main channel of the river, it is fair that a contribution towards their expenses should be made by the catchment board they may make an application to the catchment board, and that board may resolve to make to the internal board such contribution as may be specified in the resolution.

It behoves the catchment board to exercise the greatest care in determining the amount either of its precepts on or contributions to internal drainage boards, because either the internal drainage board or any county or county borough council feeling itself aggrieved by the decision may appeal to the Minister, who may make such order in the matter as he thinks just.

Compliance with any precept made by the catchment board or any Order made by the Minister may be enforced by mandamus.

A matter of particular interest to surveyors is the manner in which county and county borough councils raise the money to meet the catchment board's precept. Such councils are empowered to raise it over the whole or part of their area " having regard to the benefit, if any, derived " by various areas." This is essentially a matter for surveyors to advise on.

INTERNAL DRAINAGE DISTRICTS AND BOARDS.

It is the intention of the Land Drainage Act that the whole of the area of the country capable of benefiting or avoiding danger as a result of drainage operations shall be brought within an internal drainage district. This may be done either by constituting new drainage districts or including areas within existing districts. Where such areas are within a catchment area, it is the catchment board's duty to prepare schemes for the purpose and submit them to the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries for his approval. In the case of such an area which does not happen to be within a catchment area, provision is made for the Minister to make the necessary Order without the submission of any scheme.

In charge of each internal drainage district is a body known as an internal drainage board, which, if formed under the Act, is an elective body.

As before pointed out, provision is made in the Act for the abolition of Commissioners of Sewers, and for the areas over which they roamed to be brought, where necessary, into properly constituted internal drainage districts.

Orders or schemes may be made whereby internal drainage authorities created before the Act may become subject to the provisions of the Act so far as the election of their members and their proceedings are concerned.

An internal drainage board is of equal status in law with a catchment board, both of them being bodies corporate within a common seal. The difference between them is not one of size, because there are some internal drainage districts which are much larger than some catchment areas. The difference lies in their functions. The internal drainage board has all the powers given to drainage authorities under the Land Drainage Act, except those which specifically relate to catchment boards, and which may be summarised as follows:—

(1) Powers connected with the main river ;
(2) Power to make schemes under Section 4 ;
(3) Power to vary awards ;
(4) Power to promote or oppose Bills in Parliament or Provisional Orders ;
(5) Power to issue precepts ;
(6) Power to obtain grants.

The period of office of members of an internal drainage board formed under the Act, or to which the Act has been applied, is three years, when an election takes place. If the internal drainage board so desire, they can, after consultation with the catchment board, divide their areas into electoral districts. The electors are the ratepayers, and vote according to a scale based on the annual value of the property in respect of which the elector is entitled to vote. If such value is less than £50, he has one vote. If it amounts to £50, but is less than £100, he has two votes ; and so on, until he may have a maximum of ten votes if the annual value exceeds £1,000.

The electors list is divided into two parts, (a) owners, and (b) occupiers ; and if the same person is an owner-occupier his name must be entered in both lists.

The following are the qualifications for election as a member of a drainage board:—

(a) Owner of 10 acres of land in the district ;

(b) Occupier of not less than 20 acres ;

(c) Owner or occupier of land of the annual value of £30 or upwards ; or

(d) Nomination as a candidate by a qualified owner.

It is entirely open to the internal drainage board to say what work they will do (if any) with regard to maintenance of drains. The general practice is for the internal board to " main " certain drains and undertake their cleansing.

Some boards, it is believed, however, prefer to function in this respect by serving notices on persons under Section 35 of the Act, requiring them to maintain the watercourses under their control or flowing through land they occupy.

They have the power of commuting liabilities to do drainage works, but only with the consent of the Minister.

Probably nothing in the Land Drainage Act has created a greater storm in drainage circles than the provisions of Section 24, which provide that, in so far as their expenses are not met by contributions from the catchment board, the expenses under this or any other Act of a drainage board, other than a catchment board, shall be raised by means of drainage rates made under and in accordance with the Act by the drainage board.

As pointed out in an earlier part of this Paper, the methods of rating by drainage boards before 1930 were varied in the extreme, being on all sorts of bases.

Under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, however, every drainage rate has to be on an annual value basis, which is defined to mean the gross annual value as determined for the purposes of income tax under Schedule A of the Income Tax

Act, 1918, as amended by any subsequent enactment, and for drainage rate purposes, agricultural land, as defined in the Act, is to be assessed at its full value, all other land (using the word land in its widest sense) at one-third of its annual value.

The effect of this provision is that thousands of people throughout the country have been required to pay drainage rates for the first time, and incidentally a tremendous amount of work has been thrown on all internal drainage boards to make the necessary valuation of their district to enable them to levy a rate. This work is of a highly skilled and technical nature, and it is difficult to see how it can properly be done except by qualified surveyors.

In so far as a hereditament has a Schedule A value, the drainage board are bound by it. Many cases, however, arise where a hereditament has not a Schedule A value. In these cases it is the drainage board's duty to fix the Schedule A value. In thousands of other cases a particular property is only partly within the drainage district ; in these cases it is the drainage board's duty to fix the Schedule A value after carrying out the necessary apportionment.

It is provided in the Act that a drainage board may from time to time require the surveyors of taxes for their district to furnish to them on demand, at a rate not exceeding 5*s*. for every hundred entries numbered separately, a copy of the annual values for the time being in force for the purposes of income tax under Schedule A.

In practice the information thus obtained is frequently not helpful at all, because the surveyor of taxes deals with owners, and properties in bulk, whereas the internal drainage board have to get down to details and get on the track of all the occupiers as well as owners.

Every rate made by a drainage authority must be a uniform rate over the whole area unless they choose to make an Order, as they have power to do with the approval of the Minister, and after consulting the catchment board, dividing their district into sub-districts and levying differential rates therein.

In addition, a drainage board after consultation with the catchment board, may, by order approved by the Minister, determine that no rate shall be levied by them on the occupiers of hereditaments in any portion of the district which, in their opinion, either by reason of its height above sea level or for any other reason, ought to be exempted wholly from rating.

In construing this sub-section a difficulty arises as to whether the ejusdem generis rule applies, so that only reasons of a like nature to height above sea level can be taken into account.

For the most part the law relating to drainage rates is similar to that relating to the general rate levied by the ordinary urban or district rating authority. For instance, it must be under seal, be duly published and is recoverable in the same manner as a general rate.

There are, however, some curious differences as, for instance, the fact that any property which is unoccupied in an internal drainage district is not regarded as an "empty," but is to be deemed to be occupied by the owner.

The expenses of an internal drainage board are dealt with under the six following heads:—

(1) Administration Expenses;
(2) Works of Maintenance;
(3) Improvement of Existing Work;
(4) New Works;
(5) Precept by Catchment Board;
(6) Expenditure and Charges incurred prior to the passing of the Land Drainage Act, 1930.

The whole rate is payable to the drainage board by the occupier, who is, however, entitled to recover from the owner the portions of the rate due to items numbered (3), (4) and (5), the remaining items, numbered (1) and (2), being borne by the occupier. Payment of No. (6) depends on a variety of considerations.

It was a recommendation of the Royal Commission that drainage rates should be collected by the local rating authorities, but such recommendation has not been given effect to in the Act.

There is, however, a provision in the Act (Section 25) authorising the rating authority of an urban district, some part of which is within a drainage district, to agree with the drainage board to pay to them a sum, in lieu of the drainage board levying a drainage rate on any occupier in their district, of an amount equal to the amount the drainage rate would have produced.

In such a case the urban district would have to increase their general rate in the part of the urban district concerned by an additional item to raise the sum paid over.

It is difficult to imagine an urban rating authority availing itself of this power because it would mean that the principal property in respect of which drainage rates are payable, namely, agricultural land, would get off scot free inasmuch as agricultural land is derated.

Although for the most part the Land Drainage Act, 1930, relates to drainage authorities as such, the following provisions with reference to county and county borough councils and private owners should not be overlooked.

COUNTY AND COUNTY BOROUGH COUNCILS.

The general drainage powers under the Act of county and county borough councils vary according as to whether the area of the county or county borough in question is within or not within a catchment area. If such land is within a catchment area the only powers they have are—

(a) All such powers as are given to drainage boards by the provisions of Section 35 of the Act (maintenance of watercourses).

(b) If the Council is of opinion that any land is capable of improvement by drainage works but that the case cannot be met by the constitution of a drainage district under the Act and that the expenses of executing and maintaining the works will not exceed the increase in the value of the land arising therefrom, they may prepare a scheme and carry out the drainage works, the estimated cost of the execution of which will not exceed an amount equal to £5 for each acre in the area to be improved or £5,000 in all.

If, however, the land in question is not within a catchment area, in addition to the above two powers, the council of the county or county borough have such powers as are given to catchment boards by the provisions of Section 10 of the Act (Exercise of powers of drainage boards in default) and all such powers as are given to drainage boards by the provisions of Section 36 (Enforcement of obligations to repair watercourses, bridges, etc.) and Section 44 (Obstructions in watercourses).

The provisions of Section 11 of the Act, which empower the Minister to transfer the functions of an internal drainage board to the catchment board, apply to a drainage board situate in a county or any part of a county which is not within a catchment area with the substitution for the references in the section to the catchment board of references to the county council.

Section 41 of the Act, which authorises the Minister by Order to revoke, vary or amend the provisions of any local Act relating to navigation rights over waters within a drainage district, applies to waters which are not within a drainage district with a modification that in the case of any such waters an application for the purpose of the said section must be made by the councils of the counties or county boroughs within whose areas the waters to which the application relates are contained.

PRIVATE PERSONS.

With regard to private persons, by Section 57 of the Act where by reason of the neglect of the occupier of any land to maintain or join in maintaining the banks, or to cleanse and scour or join in cleansing and scouring the channels of watercourses passing through, over or adjoining his lands, injury is caused to any other land the owner or occupier of that land may serve notice on such occupier requiring him as the case may be to maintain the banks or cleanse or scour the channels or to join in maintaining the banks or in cleansing or scouring the channels of the watercourses.

If a notice is duly served on him and he fails within two months to comply with it, the person by whom the notice is served may carry out the necessary works and recover from the occupier in default summarily as a civil debt the expenses incurred by him in so doing.

Useful powers are also conferred on landowners by Section 58 of the Act. If any person interested in any land desires to drain it and for that purpose considers it necessary that new drains should be opened through lands belonging to another person, or that existing drains in land belonging to another person should be cleansed, widened, straightened or otherwise improved, the person so desiring may apply in the prescribed manner to that other person for leave to make such drains or improvements in drains through or on his land.

Provisions with respect to the procedure to be followed are set out in detail in the Fifth Schedule to the Act.

Provision is also made by Section 59 of the Act for any persons interested in any land who are of opinion that it is capable of improvement by drainage works, but such works cannot be executed by reason of the objection or disability of any person whose land would be entered upon to present an application to the Minister for an Order authorising them to execute such drainage works as are expedient with a view to the improvement of the land.

To complete this survey of the Act all that now remains is to mention that there are seven schedules to it, the subject-matter of which is as follows:—

SCHEDULES.

First Schedule.—Catchment Areas and Boards.

Part I. Catchment Areas (List of).

Part II. Provisions as to Members and Proceedings of Catchment Boards.

Second Schedule.—Procedure for making and provision as to the validity of orders.

Part I. General provisions.

Part II. Provisions applicable to orders which are provisional if opposed.

Part III. Provisions with respect to the validity of orders not confirmed by Parliament.

Third Schedule.—Drainage boards other than catchment boards.

Part I. Provisions as to persons to vote at the election of members of drainage boards.

Part II. Provisions as to members and proceedings of drainage boards.

Fourth Schedule.—Provisions as to the compulsory acquisition of land by drainage board.

Fifth Schedule.—Provisions with respect to procedure in the case of applications for leave to make drains through lands of adjoining owner.

Part I. Procedure where adjoining owner assents to application.

Part II. Procedure where adjoining owner dissents.

Part III. Provisions as to drains or improvements made in pursuance of the foregoing provisions.

Sixth Schedule.—Appointment of Conservators of River Thames.

Seventh Schedule.—Enactments repealed.

The Act has now been in operation long enough for an opinion to be formed as to whether it may be regarded as a success or not. In the writer's opinion, for what it is worth, it may be said to be a success in that it has accomplished the main purpose it set out to achieve, namely, to put the land drainage of the country on a satisfactory basis.

The principles embodied in the Act are sound, and whilst certain criticisms have been made in this Paper, they have been directed mainly to the wording of the Act or matters of procedure, with a view of showing how the Act might be made more effective and easier to work.

Transactions

Held at The Chartered Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 7th May, 1934.

Mr. ALAN ARNOLD (Senior Vice-President) in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN explained that as Senior Vice-President it fell to him to take the Chair in the absence, owing to a somewhat severe illness, of the President. Most of the members were aware of the very large amount of time which Mr. Tuckett had devoted to the interests of The Institution during the past year, and the Council greatly appreciated the work he had done. The members present would, no doubt, wish an expression of their sincere sympathy to be conveyed to the President.

NEW MEMBERS.

The following new Members were presented by the PRESIDENT for formal admission to membership under By-law 31, and signed the Register:—

A DISCUSSION took place on Mr. F. M. FARMER'S Paper entitled

THE LAND DRAINAGE ACT, 1930.

Mr. J. E. BIDWELL (Past-President) said it gave him great pleasure to propose a vote of thanks to Mr. Farmer for his able Paper, and to congratulate him on the exceedingly clear way in which he had set out the provisions of the Act.

He fully endorsed what Mr. Farmer said about the condition of affairs before the Royal Commission presided over by Lord Bledisloe was appointed in 1927; it was, so far as the general drainage of the country was concerned, chaotic. When giving evidence before that Commission he realised for the first time how little was known by men who had a thorough knowledge of agricultural matters in the upland country of the conditions in the country from which he came, the Fen country. As far as the Fen country was concerned, the statement that drainage conditions were chaotic was not quite true. To the people of the Fens, drainage was vital and for many generations, ever since the reclamation of the Fens, drainage had been carefully and efficiently carried out.

He agreed with Mr. Farmer that the Act failed in certain respects. Those who were concerned with the drainage of the Fens would like to see the catchment boards given considerably more definite powers than they had at present over the internal drainage boards. In the Fens there were very important drainage levels and internal drainage boards, and their powers at the present time were not in any way curtailed; the catchment board, which should have the overriding and co-ordinating authority, was hampered because it could not carry out what Mr. Farmer had shown should in many cases be done. It was felt by many people in the Fen districts that great saving could be effected by altering the areas of internal drainage boards, but where those boards had been in existence for generations it would be appreciated how difficult it was to carry out alterations. He could give instances where on the extreme edge of one internal drainage board area all the water had to be made to go, for instance, in a south-easterly direction when its natural flow should be north-west; but because it would go into another internal drainage board's system and through their main catchwater drains it had to be pumped in the opposite direction. If the catchment boards had the full powers which Mr. Farmer would like to see them have, the re-grouping of such internal drainage boards could be properly carried out.

The system of rating under the new Act was divided into owners' and occupiers' rates. He believed he was right in saying that the owners' rates had to bear all the improvement charges, while the ordinary maintenance charges came into the occupiers' rates. In the Fen country, where drainage rates had been in existence for a long time, tenancies created in the past had generally provided either that the drainage rates were paid by the landlord or that they were paid by the tenant, and usually they were paid by the landlord. Now, however, there were owners' and occupiers' rates, and legally the tenant was responsible for the payment of the whole of the rates and could recover only that part which represented the owner's rate. He had found that it was exceedingly difficult to carry out the legal position, and personally he intended, where he had anything to do with it in future, to provide that rates should be paid as directed by law ; but where in the past rates had been paid by the landlord it seemed a very difficult matter now to obtain payment from the occupier.

Another point to which he wished to refer arose on Section 38. It was really an access of power to the internal boards rather than to the catchment boards. It had always been the practice in his part of the country, when spoil was thrown on the banks of a main drain by the drainage authority, for compensation to be paid for the damage thereby done. Usually the occupier spread the spoil, and it was useful when that was done, but in cleaning out any main catchwater drain a considerable amount of spoil was thrown on the banks and a certain amount of ground thereby wasted. Now, under Section 38, no compensation was to be paid for that, and the internal board would have the right to lay what spoil they liked on the banks without any claim being made by the occupier of the land. That was perhaps a small point where the power of the board had been increased.

He would like in conclusion sincerely to congratulate Mr. Farmer once again on the way he had presented his Paper.

Mr. ROBERT COBB (Member of Council) said it was with the greatest pleasure that he seconded the vote of thanks to Mr. Farmer, whose Paper would be a useful work of reference in the Library of The Institution.

In his short account of what led up to the passing of the Land Drainage Act Mr. Farmer mentioned that the old Commissioners of Sewers were elected for life, whereas members of the present boards were on an elective basis and could be removed. Personally he had a friend who some sixty years ago was elected a Commissioner for life, and who when he wanted to resign was told that it was not legally possible to do so. That was one of the anomalies of the old position of affairs.

There were two or three practical points on which he would like to ask for Mr. Farmer's guidance. On page 268 Mr. Farmer said there were two kinds of watercourses, and he divided them into " (i.) Main rivers; (ii.) Every other kind of passage (natural " or artificial) through which water flows." Mr. Dobson, in the Paper which he presented to The Institution in 1930, referred to the fact that since the passing of the Act " The picture was " complete, from the smallest ditch to the largest river." He wondered whether Mr. Farmer meant, by the words quoted, that the Act controlled artificial land drainage. Personally he was inclined to think that it did not, but the use of the word " artificial " seemed to show that Mr. Farmer thought it did.

He would like to ask Mr. Farmer or those in authority whether something could not be done not only to see that drainage authorities respected the rights of navigation authorities, but that navigation authorities respected the rights of drainage boards. In his own county, which was on the Thames, the Port of London Authority rushed their steamers up and down at furious rates, and the whole of the saltings and walls were going out to sea ; yet there seemed to be no remedy. There should be power to levy some sort of rate on them. That appeared to be another instance of agricultural interests being sacrificed on the altar of commercialism.

There was a practical question arising out of what Mr. Farmer said on page 271. In his area there was an owner who flatly refused to allow the catchment board to go on his sea-wall to repair it. Mr. Farmer, however, said: " It is also declared that " nothing in the section authorises any person to enter on the " land of any person except for the purpose of maintaining " existing works," and that seemed to give the catchment board full powers to go and repair any wall at any time.

Another very important point arose on page 272, where Mr. Farmer said: " By Section 9 of the Act it is the duty of every " catchment board to take steps for the commutation of all " obligations imposed on persons by reason of tenure, custom," and so on. One failure of the Act arose where one had, for example, a long stretch of sea-wall, and two out of the three owners had taken great trouble to keep their part of the sea wall in good repair. The catchment board had, under the Act, to take over the third man's bad wall and repair it at the expense of the community. The Act said that if a person were liable by custom, prescription or otherwise to do any work, the liability could be commuted. Was that a case where commutation could be claimed from the recalcitrant owner? He doubted whether that would ever come off, and in Hudson v. Tabor, the celebrated case of sea-walls, it was definitely laid down that the slack owner could not be liable. He thought that wanted remedying.

Mr. Bidwell seemed to think it was possible to take soil off an adjoining marsh to repair a sea-wall. His own board had been advised that legally that was not possible, and in fact they had paid compensation, the feeling being that one single owner should not lose a certain amount of soil for repairing the whole of the catchment board's wall.

Mr. Farmer also raised the very difficult question of what areas above a certain Ordnance datum should be rated, and paid a great compliment to The Institution by saying that it was a most difficult question which no one but a surveyor could answer. Personally he doubted very much whether a surveyor could answer it. A certain Ordnance datum above sea level had been taken for rating, but he thought it was completely wrong from A to Z. Upland authorities and owners must get it out of their heads that the lowlands should be a permanent cesspool for their drainage. It seemed to him that an 8-ft. datum was quite beside the point, because areas higher than that added to the drainage problem and should contribute.

With regard to the Schedule A assessment, which was the basis for rating, that seemed perfectly clear as far as it went, but there had been cases where the surveyor of taxes had altered the Schedule A and made it retrospective. The consequence was that when assessing the rateable value for the catchment board one never knew what other Schedule A's were going to be altered, and in certain cases the board had had to refund part of the rates already received on the then current Schedule A. That seemed wrong, and if there was to be an amending Act he thought Schedule A should be defined as that which was in existence on a certain date when the rate was made.

On page 286 Mr. Farmer referred to what he called the "curious difference" that a property was not exempted from drainage rates because it was empty. Personally that did not seem to him—although perhaps he had not understood the point—very curious, because, after all, a property had to be saved from the inroads of the sea or from flooding whether it was empty or not. A man paid poor rate on a property whilst occupying it because while he was in occupation he obtained the benefits which the rates provided—police, lighting, roads, and so on—but even if he was not occupying the property he still wanted it saved from flooding by drainage, and therefore the difference in question seemed a natural one.

Mr. Bidwell had referred to the subject of scots, but had not dealt with it in quite the way that he personally had wished to do. He wanted to know whether, where a tenant had an agreement definitely to pay the whole scot, the Act overrode that, and whether the landlord could be compelled to pay the landlord's proportion. He had acted for landlords in the vice versa position, where the landlord had agreed to pay the scot but now tried to saddle the tenant with the tenant's proportion, and he had always contended that under his tenancy agreement he (the landlord) was liable for the whole.

Sir HARRY PRITCHARD (Visitor) said he did not propose to say anything on behalf of the Association of Municipal Corporations, of which he was secretary; he was, as it were, out of school hours.

He was a little disappointed that Mr. Farmer had not referred, and had suggested it was unnecessary to refer, to the law before 1930, because the law before that date was really interesting. There was a wonderful series of old Acts relating to Commissioners of Sewers. It would be appropriate if they went back to the Flood, but as a matter of fact they dated only from the time of Henry VIII., or something like that. One was rather surprised to find that the Land Drainage Act of 1930 was a comparatively short Act, and one sometimes wondered whether it really embodied all the useful powers which were contained in the old Commissioners of Sewers Acts. Personally he was a little doubtful on the subject.

Mr. Farmer referred to the obligations imposed on persons by reason of tenure, custom, prescription, or otherwise, which were to be commuted, and very possibly some of those obligations arose under the old Acts to which he had referred. He imagined that surveyors would have very little difficulty in arriving at the commutation of the obligations; on the other hand, he imagined the lawyers might have considerable difficulty in ascertaining what the obligations were.

The Paper was concerned with the law on the subject and not really with the principles of it, but Mr. Farmer added that the main principles embodied in the Act were sound. That undoubtedly was correct. The principle that the whole of the catchment area should be under the control of one board was so perfectly obvious that one was surprised to think it had not been put into operation years ago.

In regard to the payment of expenses—always a very difficult subject—the old principle was, as he understood it, that those who got the benefit, or those who were thought to get the benefit, should have to pay. In principle that did not seem bad, but it was entirely out of date in these socialistic days. One was not surprised, therefore, to find that the principle of payment according to benefit had been dropped in the case under discussion also. Whether matters had gone too far was a question about which there might be some doubt. There might be cases of owners of agricultural land on a main river, but not in any internal district. What would they pay towards the expenses incurred in the prevention of floods? The land being agricultural, they did not pay a county rate, and not being in an internal district they would not have to pay a drainage rate; the only way in which they would have to contribute would be through taxation, when taxes were used for the purpose.

Although the Act was passed in 1930 it could not come into full operation until well on in 1931, and it was a little unfortunate that when the catchment boards were formed, and were in a position to do something, they were suddenly told that the whole principle on which the finance of the Act was based was to be departed from. That principle was contributions by the State, contributions by the counties and county boroughs, and contributions by the internal drainage districts, but the State withdrew, leaving the other people to carry on, and that manifestly placed very great difficulties in the way of the catchment boards. He had had the advantage of reading the report of Mr. Farmer's catchment board for the year ended 31st March, 1933, and he had been astonished to find how much they had been able to do with their limited means. There had not been very much, of course, in the way of new construction, but they had been able to do a vast amount of work on maintenance and improvements of various kinds; and he had not the slightest doubt that Mr. Farmer's board and the other boards would do a great work for the benefit of this country.

Mr. A. T. A. DOBSON, C.V.O., C.B.E. (Assistant Secretary, Ministry of Agriculture) (Visitor), said there were two points in particular to which he desired to refer. He was glad that Sir Harry Pritchard had mentioned finance, but he would like to correct what might possibly have given a false impression. One of the greatest difficulties with which the catchment boards had had to contend was that just about the time—in September and October, 1931—when they had all been set up, the last having been constituted in September, 1931, they received a circular from the Ministry which had usually been regarded, he thought entirely wrongly, as a withdrawal of the Government from its participation in the financial affairs of the catchment boards, namely, the withdrawal of Government grants. So far as land drainage was concerned, and apparently in every other direction, the Government in 1931 found that, to put it vulgarly, the till was empty; and as, under the Land Drainage Act, there was a question of Government grants, they said "We are very sorry, but for the time being there is only a limited amount of money available for catchment boards" (some of which were extremely poor, while others were rich) "and for the moment we can help you only as far as that money will go." It was true that that money went only a very little way, but it would be quite wrong to say that the Government definitely withdrew financial assistance. Indeed, he might mention that over a year ago the Government made a grant of £102,000 to a drainage board to keep the sea out. That was in connection with a scheme which came within the category of an emergency scheme, which was the only type of scheme the Government felt they could possibly assist, with the limited amount of money at their disposal. Since that date, however, the door had been opened a little more widely by a circular sent out on the 24th March last, and certainly, speaking departmentally, he was fairly hopeful about the future; but the withdrawal of the Government from its contract—he did not agree with the term—was merely a temporary matter due to the necessity for the Government to economise.

Even that, however, had brought its advantages, because the catchment boards had all the more time, instead of trying to scramble for money for desirable schemes, to work out the re-organisation of their own districts. It would perhaps surprise the members to know that they applied themselves with such vigour to the re-organisation of their internal drainage boards—which had a vital effect, of course, on their financial structure—that the Ministry had been able to approve no less than 62 schemes of re-organisation spread over 47 catchment areas. When one thought that all those schemes might have had to go to Parliament for approval, it showed that the catchment boards had been extraordinarily vigorous in the period during which they had not been able, owing to the lack of Government grants, to undertake any serious work of a capital nature. In saying that, he did not wish to give the impression that they had not done an enormous amount of maintenance work which, if left undone, might have led to flooding.

Mr. Farmer had been kind enough to call attention to certain defects in the Act, and had mentioned that, as no doubt members were aware, in the year 1931 an Amending Bill was prepared. There were reasons which made it undesirable to introduce that Bill into Parliament, and of course he had no authority now to say when it would be introduced; nevertheless, the Ministry were working very hard upon it and, departmentally speaking, they had got it fairly straight, and he thought it would deal with all the points which Mr. Farmer had mentioned. They were going to try also to deal with the point mentioned by Mr. Cobb, the damage done by navigation, for which it did not pay. There was a very serious case of that on the River Yare, where the boats went right up to Norwich and knocked all the banks of the catchment board to pieces. Then there was the question of Sections 38 and 34, where there was undoubtedly some overlapping, one section saying that compensation was to be paid and the other that it was not. It was to points of that sort that very careful consideration was being given, and amendments had been prepared which, subject to final endorsement by Parliamentary Counsel, would meet the position. He agreed that the question of supervision in Section 7 was a very important point, which would have to be, and would be, dealt with. Another thing was commutation; the more they looked at commutation under Section 9 at the Ministry the more difficult they found it, but he was not prepared to say that they could really improve that much.

There were two other small points to which he would like to refer, the first of which concerned Section 6. The provision of Section 6, by which a catchment board could make an arrangement with a town like Bedford, had quite a simple origin. The Ministry received a deputation representing chiefly Bedford and Cambridge, both of whom took a very great pride in the river going through their town and had certain powers to do works on that river. They said " Will you give us an amendment which will enable us to continue to look after our river front and make arrangements with the catchment board to that end? " The case was put forcibly, and so that provision was put in. The Minister deliberately refused to go further and give the power to the county councils, because a county council had no particular interest in a river flowing through an open piece of country; and the Minister felt that if he extended the provision to county councils, a catchment board might dissipate all its powers over other such bodies and do nothing itself. The position was perhaps different now, but that was a very possible result when the Act was first passed.

The other point which he wished to mention was this. Mr. Farmer made rather light of the lengthy procedure required for action under Section 4 (1) (b), but the difficulties of the Ministry must be realised. Even when a drainage district had been constituted under Section 4 (1) (b), with all the rigmarole involved, furious letters were sometimes received through the local Member of Parliament from someone who found he was rated for the first time. There were always people who years afterwards did not know they had come into a drainage district in spite of the elaborate procedure. He did not think Mr. Farmer would ever satisfy a House of Commons Committee that anything less than the procedure set out in the Second Schedule would give the individual taxpayer a chance of making his case and getting a fair hearing if he was going to be made to pay taxes for the first time.

He would like to thank The Institution for the privilege of hearing Mr. Farmer's Paper, and would assure The Institution that in so far as the Land Drainage Act of 1930 could be made better than it was at present the Ministry had that very much at heart, and he hoped that at some not very far-distant date it would be possible to improve it materially.

The CHAIRMAN then called on Mr. R. W. Jolly, who, he said, had won the President's Prize this year for a Paper on "Drainage "rating," read before the Junior Organisation.

Mr. R. W. JOLLY (Professional Associate) said he would like to stress the point that arterial drainage in the Fens had been carried on for about five hundred years, and the local people there really did know something about the job. He thought it would be reasonable to say that, except in odd cases, they had done their work in an exceedingly efficient manner, and therefore the Act was somewhat of a mixed blessing to them.

As Mr. Farmer said, the greatest storm arose out of the rating provisions. One could talk for a week on drainage rating, but it must suffice to say that while the principles which led to the adoption of an annual value rating were appreciated, namely, that the drainage rate should bear some relation to the productive output of the land, the practical application of Schedule A had produced the most appalling inequalities. It was not unusual to find adjacent farms where the true rental value varied not more than 5*s*. an acre, but the Schedule A assessments varied 30*s*. an acre. He knew of a case of two fields of 10 acres which on an acreage rating both paid the same rate, but as soon as they went on to Schedule A one field had to pay double as much as the other.

There was also a great dislike among the Fen people to supervision and interference by the catchment board after they had been allowed to do their job themselves for five hundred years ; nevertheless, he thought far-seeing Fen drainers did realise that a great deal of good could come out of Section 4 (1) (b), which provided for the amalgamation of drainage districts. The existing internal drainage districts in the Fens were very small; they were built up on the pumping capacity of a windmill, but now, with modern oil-engines and centrifugal pumps, it was possible with one pumping station to drain many thousands of acres of land, whereas in the old days only a few hundred acres could be dealt with. The eventual outcome of the amalgamations which the catchment board were carrying out would be much more efficient and economical drainage.

There was one further point on the Act which he would like to raise, arising out of the definition of the word "drainage" in Section 81, which read: " 'Drainage,' except in the phrase 'any

" 'enactments relating to the drainage of land,' includes defence "against water, irrigation, warping and the supply of water." In his own district a large number of farms had to rely solely on dyke water for the stock. If there was an obstruction in the drains of a neighbouring farm or in the drains of an internal board before the Act was passed, and the water would not come up to the buildings for the stock, one had no remedy. One went to the internal drainage board and asked them what they were going to do about it, and their reply would be "Our job is to "get water away, not to bring it up." The definition to which he had referred, therefore, which made a drainage authority also an irrigation authority and an authority for the supply of water on broad lines, was very useful to the Fen people, and he had had two cases in which it had been possible to persuade the board to carry out some very necessary work which it was most unlikely they would have done had it not been possible to show them that definition of drainage.

Several speakers had referred to the fact that the economy campaign of 1931 had hit the catchment boards very hard, and there was some apprehension that a large number of new internal drainage boards were going to be formed more in order to enable the catchment board to obtain a precept with which to carry out its work than for carrying out actual drainage works in the area which the new board was formed to cover.

Mr. E. C. STRATHON (Professional Associate) said that for surveyors the most important part of the Act was Part IV., in which lay most of their activities, and where they were directed that all over the country the rates were to be based on annual value; on agricultural land on the full annual value, and on other land on one-third. When they turned to the definition of agricultural land, however, they found that it did not include the farm buildings or farm houses, and, therefore, it was necessary to go over hundreds of thousands of acres of land in England and endeavour to apportion out of a single Schedule A provided by the inspector of taxes the value of the farm buildings and farm houses. That was the first difficulty.

Then there was the case of a single Schedule A on a hereditament which was partly inside and partly outside the drainage area. Apparently there were many ways of dealing with that apportionment, but he earnestly hoped that most drainage areas would apportion such a value for Schedule A on a scientific basis, and not on a flat rate on the acreage basis. He supposed all surveyors would think of the rental of a farm as being made up from a field to field valuation, the total being the rent which the inspector of taxes adopted. They should therefore disintegrate each field value in that Schedule A, and of course it must be borne in mind, in making such a valuation, that it was only the land inside the drainage area on which the burden of the drainage rate fell, so that that charge must be deducted from the value of that portion.

It was also provided by the Act that where there was no Schedule A an annual value must be made by the drainage board. It was surprising to find how many properties had no Schedule A assessments. There were such hereditaments as gravel pits, gas and electricity works, waterworks, and so on; and he understood that churches and chapels also were supposed to be rated under that section—it was to be hoped on a very low basis. That showed the amount of work which was put on drainage authorities, and he thought that the initial expense of making valuation lists and rate-books for the drainage authority on some hundreds of thousands of acres of land was rather unwarrantable when there was an efficient system on the acreage basis at hand which had worked satisfactorily for about a hundred years. Having incurred the initial expense involved, it was then found that instead of having a small rate-book, where everyone knew what a field was rated at and had been rated at for the past hundred years, they had a very voluminous valuation list of about fourteen columns which needed a chartered accountant to look after it all the year round, instead of having, as in the old days, three collectors in various parts of the level sitting at the receipt of custom and balancing the acreage and cash, and that being the end of it. He was sure that the administration expenses in many drainage areas had increased tenfold by reason of the adoption of the Schedule A basis.

He was aware that 40 or 50 per cent. of England had always been rated on an annual value basis (not Schedule A), but the change from an acreage basis to a Schedule A basis was unwarrantable from another point of view, namely, that in many cases the land had changed hands by sale or letting or had been mortgaged on the understanding that there were certain burdens on the land. Every tenant or purchaser took the land on that understanding, knowing very well, for example, that there was 2*s*. an acre on a piece of land which would never alter. It was his experience, however, in the case of over 100,000 acres of land, that the whole burden of taxation had changed, and that the man who had been paying the lowest drainage rate was now paying the most. The people on the high land, with valuable fruit land, who used to pay 3*s*. or 4*s*. an acre, now paid on an annual value of £10 an acre and paid perhaps ten times as much as before.

It behoved surveyors to look after the Schedule A assessments of their clients in a very careful manner, to see that all the deductions had been made under the conditions of the tenancy ; and he would like to express the rather forlorn hope that if the amending Bill did come into being, it would provide that an alternative basis might be adopted by any drainage authority, which might levy drainage rates either on an acreage basis or on the annual value, as they desired.

Mr. E. WITTON BOOTH, M.B.E., A.M.INST.C.E. (Fellow), said he would devote himself more particularly to the question raised by previous speakers as to the difficulty which surveyors might find in regard to the making of Schedule A valuations in internal drainage areas considering the question from the point of view of Schedule A valuations and their relation to valuations for rating. Many Schedule A valuations were, in fact, taken from rating valuations, and, in so far as they were, that uniformity which was the aim in valuations for rating was in turn secured to Schedule A valuations. In regard to the latter, however, the modern practice of the Inland Revenue Department tended to depart from that uniformity, as, for instance, in the case of premises let at uncontrolled rentals, where, in the event of the actual rental paid being in excess of the gross value for rating, that actual rental was taken for the purposes of Schedule A. After all, it should be remembered that Schedule A was essentially a tax on income, and, as matters now stood, when rentals from similar properties were often materially different, so also in like manner variations occurred in Schedule A assessments—uniformity did not exist.

It was well known that, in the provinces, for most industrial valuations, for the purposes of rating no gross value had to be determined; hence in regard to those properties where Schedule A values were derived by taking the assessments for rating as a basis certain additions thereto would be necessary. It was true that for the purposes of Section 18 of the Finance Act, 1919, in very many cases certain annual values on Schedule A basis would be in existence, though care should be taken to ascertain that those were complete, or, in other words, that all was included therein which should be included for the purposes now in question.

Presumably the object of the adoption of the Schedule A basis for the assessments under the Land Drainage Act was to secure equitable contributions from those who benefit by the expenditure incurred. Particularly, therefore, where an internal drainage area extended into more than one county, if rating assessments were to be used as a basis in arriving at Schedule A annual values, it was obviously necessary to examine that the same method had been used throughout in estimating the assessments for rating of similar premises. Thus, for example, where rating valuations had been made on the "contractor's" or structural method, say, by taking a certain percentage on an estimated present effective capital value, arrived at by increasing the pre-war effective capital value by a certain percentage, that in all cases throughout the area in question, irrespective of county boundaries, those same percentages were adopted.

On page 285 Mr. Farmer said: "Many cases, however, arise "where a hereditament has not a Schedule A value. In these "cases it is the drainage board's duty to fix the Schedule A "value." He would like to ask for information with regard to the method used in Yorkshire in the case of gas, electricity and water undertakings. Usually such undertakings had no Schedule A value assessed thereon. It might be that in the case of a gasworks, for example, a Schedule A value had been determined for the purposes of Section 18 of the Finance Act of 1919, but such would include only a part of the gasworks, and would be of little value for the present purpose. In all those undertakings it would be very dangerous indeed to regard the rating valuation as a criterion of Schedule A value; indeed, in very many cases such a valuation would be entirely misleading, for the reason that a rating valuation was arrived at on a profits basis, and, should it be that a particular undertaking was deficient in profits, the anunal value for rating would be reduced accordingly; whereas for the purposes of Schedule A the basis to adopt was by applying a percentage to the present capital value, and the actual profit made by the undertaking was immaterial.

It was well known that in valuations for rating of indirectly productive parts of an undertaking, the method usually adopted was on a "contractor's" basis not dissimilar to that used for industrial hereditaments. For the purposes of Schedule A it was clear that a similar practice must prevail relative to such parts, and in his opinion should be further extended to the directly productive parts, i.e., to service mains and such like.

He would like to know exactly what was being done in the assessments on those undertakings in the Yorkshire Ouse district, because he knew that there they had advanced much further than in some other parts of the country. Perhaps Mr. Farmer would also say what they did in regard to sewers, and whether there the capital value was taken, and, if so, on what method of estimation. It seemed to him that one should not distinguish very much in the methods applied in the assessments of a sewer, a water main, a gas main, and an electric cable—that was, all should be taken on a percentage of the present estimated effective capital value.

Mr. J. A. E. TRENCHARD (Professional Associate) said he wished to refer to the conflicting way in which Sections 34 and 38 dealt with spoil.

The great chemical industries of the country were progressing very rapidly, and soon small factories might be cropping up everywhere. Moreover, oil was now being used for far more purposes than ever before, and there was a consequent pollution of streams. In the Wandle there was a filthy mess which suggested pollution chemically. If spoil was thrown out on the banks of polluted streams one would not get rid of any poisons until they had been properly oxidised or weathered over a period, the length of which would depend on the chemicals present. When they were fully oxidised, although mixed with the soil water, the various crops, whether market-garden crops or whatever they might be, would not be poisoned. It might be urged that the point was a small one because the acreage of the land affected would be small ; but when one came to consider the total length of the ditches concerned under drainage schemes, one could then realise what a big acreage it amounted to in the aggregate ; and as time went on, there would be a greater mass of the stuff, because the authorities were dealing with the clearing work properly.

Those poisons were bad for agriculture. It might be said that if the stuff was spread it would be all right in a short time ; it would be oxidised and the plants would not be hurt. It was necessary, however, to have the place on which to spread it, or it would not oxidise. That increased the area needed for weathering, and during the period while that was taking place the farmer had to go without that acreage. That was not all, because the rain fell from heaven, and those poisons were carried far from the edge of the ditches and poisoned the roots of growing vegetation. He hoped, therefore, that when the Act was amended some provision would be made for paying compensation to agriculturists, for it would have been earned.

Mr. A. C. Elliott (Professional Associate) said that on page 284 Mr. Farmer said " the methods of rating by drainage " boards before 1930 were varied in the extreme, being on all " sorts of bases. Under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, however, " every drainage rate has to be on an annual value basis," and he went on to say : " The effect of this provision is that thousands " of people throughout the country have been required to pay " drainage rates for the first time." He would very much like to know what Mr. Farmer had in mind there. Was it that in a great many instances under the old system of taxation farmers had sold small plots of land for building purposes and having said nothing about it to the drainage authority, continued to pay on the same acreage, while the occupiers of the newly built houses were not paying drainage rates at all, whereas under the new system everybody was roped in, so that the new occupiers were now paying drainage rates? Did Mr. Farmer refer to that kind of thing, or had he in mind the fact that in many drainage districts there existed high lands which under the old system of taxation were exempt from rating, but which did not appear to be exempt under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, because it would appear that under that Act all hereditaments within the boundaries of the drainage district were rateable?

He would like to join with previous speakers in thanking Mr. Farmer for a very interesting Paper.

The CHAIRMAN then put the vote of thanks to the author for his Paper, which was carried with acclamation.

The following written reply has been received from Mr. F. M. FARMER:—

I have carefully perused the transcript of the shorthand note of the discussion on my Paper, and should like to take this opportunity of expressing my thanks to the various speakers and to say how helpful I found the discussion to be.

Mr. Bidwell and other speakers referred to the incidence of drainage rates as between owners and occupiers. In the absence of agreement, the statutory provisions will, of course, have effect, and the occupier will have to bear administration and maintenance charges, and the owner the costs of new works and improvements.

In the issue of the Justice of the Peace and Local Government Review for 20th May, 1933, however, in answer to a correspondent the reply is given: "There is nothing in the Land Drainage "Act, 1930, to prevent an occupier contracting with the owner "to bear the burden of the owner's drainage rate," and presumably the converse would apply.

Mr. Cobb also raised several interesting points, with which I will deal.

In suggesting that "watercourses" under the Act might be natural or artificial, I meant to convey that any watercourse which came under the Act would do so whether it was natural or artificial, e.g., new cuts, culverts, &c. Indeed the Dutch River in the River Ouse (Yorks) Catchment Area, although a purely artificial channel, is, nevertheless, marked as part of the main river system of the area. I did not mean to suggest that, e.g., field-drains, which only drain one field, came under the Act.

There is no doubt navigation authorities under the Act are in a very favoured position. For instance, no notice can be served under Section 35 in respect of any watercourse under the jurisdiction of a navigation authority except with their consent. Again, nothing in Section 44 (Obstructions in watercourses) applies to any works under the control of a navigation authority.

These examples are in addition to the general protection they have in Section 61, and I quite agree with the suggestion that there should be mutual observance of each other's interests as between navigation and drainage authorities. I was glad to learn from Mr. Dobson's remarks that this was one of the matters he hoped would receive attention when the Land Drainage Act is amended, as this is the only way it can be done.

With reference to the powers of drainage authorities to enter on land for the purpose of the exercise of their powers, it is quite true there is nothing in the Act definitely authorising a drainage authority to do this. I think, however, Section 34 (4) is sufficiently clear that they may do so without the owner's consent for maintenance purposes.

The case of Hudson v. Tabor, referred to by Mr. Cobb, is certainly a great obstruction in the way of a catchment board establishing a liability to do main river works, because it decided that the mere fact that although a person and his predecessors in title may have carried out sea defence works for generations, that is, in itself, no evidence that they were liable to do so.

Mr. Cobb also touched on Section 6 (4) with reference to the catchment board's inability to enter into an agreement with the county and rural councils, and I would refer him to Mr. Dobson's remarks on the subject.

May I say here how thoroughly I appreciated Mr. Dobson's contribution to the discussion, though without further labouring the point, I still think the procedure to get a scheme made under Section 4 (1) (b) confirmed is somewhat elaborate.

Several speakers touched on the questions that arise owing to the basis of drainage rating now being Schedule A. It seems to be general all over the country that owners of property in drainage districts are taking steps to get the Schedule A value of such property reduced, and members of The Institution may be interested to know that the matter is receiving the attention of the Catchment Boards Association, and that a suggestion has been made that a drainage board should be given an opportunity, on an appeal against Schedule A, to show cause if they so desire, and in any case be supplied with full particulars of any changes in the Schedule A assessments.

For general rate purposes, as is well known, an unoccupied property is not rateable, and one might have expected the same rule would be followed for drainage rating purposes. I quite agree, however, there is much more reason for rating unoccupied property to drainage rates than there is for rating unoccupied property to the general rate.

I should very much like to have been able to give Mr. Witton Booth the information he sought on the methods of arriving at the Schedule A value of porperties, such as water undertakings which have no Schedule A value, but I regret I cannot do so as I am clerk to a catchment board which is not a rating authority, and such matters do not come within my direct purview. All I can usefully say is that if a particular hereditament has no Schedule A value, the drainage board must themselves determine it, and must not accept any ready-made value for other purposes, e.g., its rateable value.

In reply to Mr. Elliot, when I said that thousands of people were being called upon to pay drainage rates for the first time under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, I had in mind, mainly, drainage districts formerly rated on the acreage basis. In such districts the owners and occupiers of every kind of rateable hereditament will now have to pay drainage rates.

THE SIXTY-SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COUNCIL.

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING,

Monday, 28th May, 1934.

Mr. A. G. Cross and Mr. R. H. R. Stewart retired from the Council at the end of last session. Mr. Cross had represented the Quantity Surveyors' Section, and Mr. Stewart the Irish Branch upon the Council, and the sincere thanks of The Institution are due to them for the services rendered by them over a number of years.

The new members of the Council elected at the beginning of the session were Mr. E. J. Silcock (Yorkshire), Mr. R. Ingleby Smith, O.B.E. (Northern Ireland), and Mr. Oswald Healing (Quantity Surveyors).

The Institution was honoured by the presence at their Annual Dinner, in March, of the Most Honourable The Marquess of Carisbrooke, G.C.B., G.C.V.O. The Dinner was held at the Café Royal, and was attended by some 350 persons. A reduction in the number of speeches proved, it is thought, generally popular.

Substantial improvements have been effected in the organisation and equipment of the offices at Great George Street. Internal structural alterations have been made in the general office, which will both facilitate an easier and more efficient supervision of the staff, and enable them to do their work in greater comfort. The whole of the office equipment has been modernised throughout, and the accounting, filing and correspondence systems brought into accord with the most up-to-date methods.

The Council intend that the work of revising the By-laws of The Institution shall be undertaken next session, and have invited the County Branches to notify the Secretary of any amendments which they think should be considered.

Medrington, Liverpool (1914), who was Chairman of the Lancashire and Cheshire Branch for the current year; Sir Stanford Downing (Hon. Member, 1917), the Secretary to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; and the Rt. Hon. Sir. J. Tudor Walters (1919), at one time His Majesty's Paymaster-General, whose position in the profession was unique in that he was the only practising member who had attained Cabinet rank.

Obituary notices of these and other well-known members have appeared in the " Journal " during the year.

Finance.

It is with satisfaction that the Council are again able to report that The Institution finances are in a sound condition. Members will recall that during the year the offices have been completely re-organised, involving a heavy expenditure, and further substantial charges have been incurred by the issue of the Memorandum on the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, new features in the "Journal," the provision for the use of members of a tent at the Bath and West and Southern Counties Show, donations for professional objects and legal charges. A strict watch on other expenditure has been exercised throughout the year, with the result that the surplus from Income Account is substantially the same as during the previous year.

The amount received by way of entrance fees for new members and placed to Capital Account was £1,135, and the Council have been enabled to increase the reserve by £3,000.

The Examinations.

Table C shows the number of entries for the 1934 examinations as compared with previous years, and the number of passes. Table D shows the results, in analytical form, achieved by candidates in England and Wales. In addition, 197 candidates were re-examined in their Typical Subject. Of these 132 were successful.

There were 75 Scottish candidates, of whom 40 entered for Part I., 5 for Parts I. and II., and 10 for Part II. of the Intermediate, 15 for the Final and Special Degree, and 5 for Typical Subjects. Of these 38 passed Part I., and 13 Part II. of the Intermediate, 14 the Final and Special Degree, while 2 were referred back in their Typical Subjects.

The Irish candidates numbered 30, of whom 10 passed Part I. and 4 Part II. of the Intermediate, 9 the Final and Special Degree, and 2 were referred back in their Typical Subjects.

For the Women House Property Management Certificate Examination 16 candidates presented themselves, and 12 were successful.

In order to call attention to the need for care on the part of intending candidates in selecting offices for articles or training, the publication " How to become a Surveyor " was revised and brought up to date during the year, and circulated to schools and education authorities throughout the country.

The discontinuance of the Students' Division of the Intermediate Examination, to which reference was made in the last Annual Report, has necessitated a re-arrangement of the Prizes and Scholarships, some of which were confined to student candidates. The list of prizes as rearranged is shown in the revised issue of the Rules of Examination, published in July, 1933, and includes a new prize, to be known as the "Hyman Marks Prize," which will be awarded each year to the candidate who is placed at the head of the list for Part I. of the Intermediate Examination. The value of this prize is six guineas, which sum is derived from the interest upon a sum bequeathed to The Institution under the will of the late Mr. Hyman Marks (Fellow).

An important innovation in the administrative machinery of the examinations has been introduced during the year by the establishment of an Examinations Scrutiny Board. The function of the Board is to scrutinise all the question papers set by the examiners. and to see that they are within the scope of the syllabus, are so framed as to leave no doubt of the examiners' intentions, and are of a proper length and standard having regard to the time allowed. The Council are of the opinion that the Scrutiny Board has

The Special Diploma Examinations.

The examinations for the Special Diplomas in Rating and Town Planning were held in June, 1933, the entries numbering eight and five respectively. The following candidates were successful:—Rating : Messrs. J. L. Dedicoat (Liverpool), George Edwards (Merthyr Tydfil), W. Pierson (Bolton), and J. S. Pridmore (London). Town Planning : Mr. M. Fuller (Dartford), and Mr. P. W. Macfarlane (London).

The University and Travelling Scholarships.

The University Scholarship for 1933 was awarded to Mr. J. R. Strachan (Wellington). A Travelling Scholarship was awarded to Mr. A. C. Golding, P.A.S.I., who is utilising his emoluments for travel in Great Britain and Northern Europe, and for carrying out investigations into agricultural buildings and capital equipment with a view to making an original contribution to existing knowledge on that subject. Mr. Golding's Scholarship has since been extended to enable him to amplify his investigations by travel in America. For 1934 the University Scholarship was granted to Mr. Michael Sherwin, of Stonyhurst and Pembroke College, Cambridge.

One University Scholarship of £100, tenable for three years at Cambridge, is awarded annually by the Council, after considering the personal qualifications, school record and future professional intentions of each applicant. In addition, three one-year Scholarships of £125 each are offered each year for courses of post-graduate study or for travelling. This scheme has now been in force since 1931, and the results so far as can be judged at the present early stage are proving far more satisfactory than was the case under the old system. Good reports have been received from the Cambridge authorities of the work of The Institution scholars now at the University; and the year under review has seen a satisfactory conclusion of the work of the first two Travelling Scholars, Mr. W. M. F. Vane and Mr. S. E. Scammell.

Mr. Vane spent nine months studying agriculture and estate forestry in Germany, and carried out, in addition, an investigation into certain political aspects of German land reform. Mr. Scammell travelled in Denmark, Sweden, Northern Germany, France and Holland, and made a study of the practice of agriculture, forestry and rural estate management in those countries. In accordance with the conditions of their Scholarships, Mr. Vane and Mr. Scammell have presented to the Council full reports of their travels and investigations. These reports make interesting reading, and may be consulted in the Library by members who wish to see them.

Applications for Scholarships should be made by letter addressed to the Secretary of The Institution before 31st October each year.

The College of Estate Management.

The President of the College this year is Mr. C. Herbert Bedells (Past-President). Sir Charles Gott (Vice- President) was nominated during the year as Vice-President of the College, and Messrs. A. W. Brackett, R. T. Dadson, O.B.E., and E. P. Weller as Governors. The report for the past year showed continued growth of the operations and resources of the College, and it is hoped that in the immediate future progress may be made on the side of post-graduate and consultative work.

The Annual Country Meeting.

The Annual Country Meeting of 1933 was held in Bath, the Gloucestershire, Somerset and North Wiltshire Branch being responsible for the arrangements. The centre was an ideal one, and the meeting was much enjoyed by the 250 members who took part in the various functions. A full report of the meeting appeared in the " Journal " for August, 1933.

The Council wish to place on record the thanks of The Institution to the Mayor and Corporation of Bath, the Bath Spa Committee, the Marquess of Bath, Miss Talbot, Canon Alcock, Mr. R. W. Blathwayt, Messrs. J. S. Fry and Sons, Ltd., Messrs. Blackmore & Longdon, Messrs. The Bath and Portland Stone Firms, Ltd., Mr. A. J. Taylor, F.R.I.B.A., and others for their acts of hospitality and other special services in connection with the meeting, and to Alderman T. Sturge Cotterell, M.B.E., and Mr. D. M. Lawrance, B.SC., for the interesting Papers which they read on the opening day. The special thanks of the Council are also due to the Reception Committee of the Branch, to the Chairman of the Branch (Mr. Francis Peter), to the Hon. Secretary (Mr. C. H. Pritchard), to whose keenness and energy the success of the meeting was largely due, for the admirable arrangements which they made for the entertainment and comfort of visiting members. Reference must also be made to the work of the Junior Committee of the Branch, and of its Hon. Secretary (Mr. J. S. Morgan), who were responsible for organising the highly successful dance on the final evening.

The Publications.

The programme of Papers read and discussed at Ordinary General Meetings during the session was as follows:—

The attendance of members at meetings has been more than maintained, while that on 8th January, when the Dean of St. Paul's, Professor Julian Huxley and other distinguished visitors were present and took part in the discussion on Professor Carr-Saunders' Paper, was the largest for many years.

The thanks of the Council are due to the lecturers whose names appear above for their services to The Institution in thus assisting in the dissemination of professional knowledge; and also to those members and visitors who have enhanced the value of the meetings by joining in the discussions.

In accordance with the views expressed at this year's County Branch Conference, it has been decided as an experiment to begin the Ordinary General Meetings at 6.30 p.m. instead of 8 p.m. during the session 1934-1935.

In addition to the ordinary meetings, meetings of members practising as quantity surveyors were held on 15th November and 21st February. At the former, Mr. H. B. Bryant (Secretary, Building Industries National Council) gave an address on "Public Works," and at the latter a lantern lecture on "Building Materials Research "and its Application to Practice," was given by Dr. R. E. Stradling, M.INST.C.E. (Director of H.M. Building Research Station). Reports of these proceedings appeared in the " Journal " for January and April last.

A Memorandum on the Town and Country Planning Act 1932, prepared for the Council by Messrs. A. M. Trustram Eve, and G. D. Squibb, Barristers-at-Law, was printed and issued to all members duing the early part of the year under review. A supplement to this Memorandum, dealing with the provisions of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act, 1932, has been prepared by a Scottish lawyer (Mr. Roderick M. Nicol) for the use of Scottish members.

New features have been introduced in the " Journal " during the year in the form of monthly notes upon current legal and Parliamentary topics of interest to the profession. The Council have been fortunate in securing the services of Mr. H. F. Bidder (Barrister-at-Law) for the preparation of the legal notes. The " Journal " also now contains a " Chartered Surveyors Diary," which gives a complete list of forthcoming meetings and other events, both at headquarters and in the County Branches. Records of the President's activities have also appeared monthly.

The Library and Collections.

The value of the Library and the Loan Library has been maintained during the year by the purchase of a number of new works on technical and professional subjects and new editions of existing works.

Among the acquisitions now being made is a second edition of that invaluable work of reference, Lord Halsbury's Laws of England. The first edition has been on the shelves of the Library since its publication nearly twenty years ago, and is now being replaced by a second edition of each volume as it is issued.

The Library now possesses a complete set of Regional Survey Reports.

Arrangements have been made with a leading firm of book auctioneers for The Institution to be notified when topographical works of particular interest or value are placed on the market.

During the year a valuation was made by Messrs. Sotheby of all works in the Library of a value of more than £10. Works of a smaller value were valued by the Librarian on a replacement basis. A re-insurance of the whole of the Library was then effected.

A portrait of Mr. Alexander Goddard, C.B.E., the late Secretary, painted by Mr. Oswald Birley, was unveiled at the Ordinary General Meeting on 8th January in the presence of a large number of members. It has been added to The Institution's collection of portraits and hangs at the head of the main staircase of the building, next to the portrait of the late Mr. Julian Rogers, the first Secretary of The Institution.

The Council acknowledge their indebtedness to Mrs. Walter Lawrance for the presentation to The Institution of the Presidential Jewel and Collar of the Quantity Surveyors Association, of which her husband, the late Mr. Walter Lawrance (Fellow), was the first and the last President and one of its chief organisers; and to Colonel John Clutton for the loan, for an indefinite period, of the Silver Medal which was presented to his grandfather, the late Mr. John Clutton, in commemoration of his election in 1868 as the first President of The Institution.

Several interesting additions have been made to the Forestry Collection during the year, including a number of fine planks presented by Lord Yarborough, and some specimens of insect and fungal disease presented by Mr. F. W. Parker (Fellow). Other donors to the Collection include Colonel the Hon. W. Lawson, D.S.O., Mr. T. Roberts, and Messrs. Cuprinal, Ltd.

A number of questions on timber identification, wood preservation and the identification of timber insects and disease have been received and answered during the year.

A forestry exhibit, covering an area of over 400 square feet, was shown at the Bath and West Agricultural Society's Show at Wimbledon in May, 1933, and was awarded the gold medal of the Society. At the Royal Agricultural Society's Show at Derby in July, a silver medal, the highest award in the class, was obtained. The arrangement of these exhibits was the work of Mr. A. D. C. Le Sueur (Fellow), the Curator of the Forestry Museum, who is to be congratulated upon the results secured.

The Standing and Special Committees.

There have been 11 meetings of the Council, and 110 meetings of the Standing and Special Committees and their Sub-Committees during the year under review.

The following Parliamentary Bills, or portions of them, were examined and dealt with by the Parliamentary Committee:—

The Arbitration Bill ;
The Darlington Corporation Bill ;
The Electricity (Supply) Bill ;
The Middlesex County Council Bill ;
The North Wales Electric Power Bill ;
The Petroleum (Production) Bill ;
The Rating and Valuation (Metropolis) Amendment Bill ;
The Road Traffic Bill ;
The Solicitors Bill ;
The Water Supplies (Exceptional Shortage Orders) Bill ;
The Weston-super-Mare U.D.C. Bill ;
The Workington Corporation Bill ;
The Model Clauses for Town and Country Planning.

At the invitation of the Metropolitan Water Board, the Draft Bye-laws proposed to be made by the Board under their Act of 1932 were examined and reported upon by a special Committee appointed for the purpose.

Representatives of The Institution attended by request upon the Public Trustee and advised him upon the question of the remuneration to be paid to agents retained by his Department for work under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933.

Representations have been made to the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries urging the allocation of funds to enable a beginning to be made with the task of revising large-scale Ordnance maps of the bigger urban centres and their environs.

Further representations were made during the year urging the Chancellor of the Exchequer to grant a measure of relief to agricultural land from the burden of death duties.

Advice was taken as to the legality of the practice apparently followed by many agents of issuing eight-day summonses for rent. It would appear that this practice contravenes Sections 45 and 47 of the Solicitors Act, 1932, as even if no charge were specifically made for the issue of the summons, it might be held to have been included in the agents' fees for management. The point is one which members responsible for the management of property will do well to bear in mind.

A grant of 250 guineas was made during the year to the Rothamsted Experimental Station in aid of the fund for purchasing the freehold of the Station's experimental farm and of the land on which the laboratories stand. The purchase of these freeholds was essential to the preservation of the existence of the Experimental Station, the research carried out by which has made such valuable contributions to agricultural science.

At the instance of the Forestry Committee, Counsel's opinion was taken on the question whether estate timber yards and saw-mills were either agricultural or industrial hereditaments, and, in consequence, eligible for whole or partial derating. The case submitted to Counsel and his opinion were published in the "Journal" for August, 1933.

It was a source of much satisfaction to receive during the year a notification from the Forestry Commissioners that they proposed to encourage their district forest officers who were engaged on estate management duties to qualify for membership of The Institution.

During the year The Institution has joined other Societies in preparing, under the chairmanship of the Lord Clinton, a scheme to improve the marketing of woodland produce through voluntary collective action among landowners and their professional advisers. For this purpose the country has been divided into executive areas, and the co-ordinating authority in each is to be a whole-time organising secretary. In each area panels of experienced timber valuers are to be set up whose services will be available for the subscribers to the scheme at the fees prescribed in the Schedule of Professional Charges. If the required support is received a central headquarters organisation will ultimately be established, and it is hoped to secure the co-operation of the Home Grown Merchants' Federation. The Forestry Commission are desirous of helping the movement, and will place information at its disposal.

The Rating Diploma Section, which now consists of 55 members, held three meetings during the year, at which the following Papers were read: "The allowance for "repairs, maintenance, and renewals in the valuation of "public utility undertakings," by Mr. W. S. Barnes; "The "present tendency to reduce valuations to formulæ," by Mr. W. R. Brackett; "The apportionment of public "utility undertakings," by Mr. Eustace Peake.

The work of the Quantity Surveyors' Committee and its Sub-Committees is the subject of a separate annual report, which is published annually in the "Journal" for July.

Statutory Registration.

The meeting of the Joint Registration Committee of The Institution, the Land Agents' Society and the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute was summoned by The Institution in December to consider the present attitude of the three Societies towards registration by Act of Parliament of the professions which they represent. The Councils of the three Societies were advised that any measure of statutory registration which Parliament appeared likely to grant at the present time would on balance bring no advantage either to the public or to the professions of the land.

A letter setting out the reasons for these conclusions appeared in the Times of 4th January, 1934, and other papers, and was reprinted in the " Journal " for February.

Professional Conduct.

By the commencement of the session in June, 1933, a new Joint Code of Conduct had been prepared by a Joint Committee of The Institution, the Land Agents' Society, the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute, and the Incorporated Society of Auctioneers and Landed Property Agents, and had been adopted by the Councils of those Societies with a view to its being enforced throughout the whole of their membership, covering some 20,000 practitioners. The new Code was substantially the same as that which had already been in force among members of The Institution since January, 1932.

The four Societies having been advised that the Code, in order to be effective, should be incorporated as part of their constitutional rules, steps were taken by each to obtain the approval of their members to the necessary alterations in By-laws and Articles of Association. The requisite amendments to By-law 24 of The Institution were passed and confirmed by large majorities at well-attended general meetings on 9th and 16th October ; and the amendments, having since been ratified by His Majesty's Privy Council, are now incorporated in the By-law referred to.

The requisite amendments to the By-laws of the Land Agents' Society, and to the Articles of Association of the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute, and of the Incorporated Society of Auctioneers and Landed Property Agents were passed by large majorities at meetings held respectively in January, December, and March. This means nothing less than that the whole of the best elements in the professions of surveyor, land agent, auctioneer, estate agent and valuer have voluntarily submitted themselves to obligatory rules for the observance of professional decency.

It is a source of pride and gratification to the Council that the members of The Institution and of the three above-mentioned Societies should have given such ready and whole-hearted support to a measure which, drastic as it may at first have seemed, was felt to be essential to the future good of the profession.

Forty-four complaints of departure from the requirements of The Institution as to professional conduct and practice were investigated during the year, appropriate action being taken in cases where the complaint was substantiated. Numerous enquiries in connection with the application of the Code of Conduct were also received and answered.

The Agricultural Conference.

The Third Annual Conference of Agricultural Members, arranged by the Agricultural Committee, was held at headquarters on 5th December, and was well attended by members from all parts of the country. The morning session was devoted to discussions upon the following subjects:—

Agricultural Tenant-Right Valuation of Hay and Straw: (opened by Major Nelson Rooke (Fellow)).

The Rights of Way Act, 1932:—(opened by Mr. J. A. Arnold-Forster (Fellow)).

The Land Drainage Act, 1930, Section 26 (4) (c):—(opened by Mr. A. J. Burrows (Fellow)).

Sir Lawrence Chubb (Secretary, Commons, Open Spaces, and Footpaths Preservation Society) was present during the discussion on the Rights of Way Act, and gave a most instructive address which was highly appreciated by the members present.

At the afternoon session Mr. W. H. Myles, one of the Senior Marketing Officers of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, delivered an excellent lecture on recent developments in agricultural marketing.

Reports of these addresses and discussions appeared in the "Journal" for January and February last.

The County Branches.

Close contact between the County Branches and headquarters has been maintained throughout the year. The President and Secretary have made it their business to visit the greater number of local centres at least once during the period under review, and were as usual impressed with the value to members of the work of the County Branch organisation, in particular to those members who are unable to attend meetings and other functions in London.

Included in the sessional programmes of County Branch meetings were Papers and discussions on the following subjects, the list of which is an interesting sidelight on the scope and variety of the professional knowledge which is required of a Chartered Surveyor:—

The marketing of home-grown timber;
Slum clearance and improvement schemes;
Modern survey instruments and their uses;
Geology in relation to architecture and surveying;
The future of agriculture in the light of its present;
Tithe rent-charge;
The machinery for conciliation in the building trade;
Fire claims and assessments;
Aspects of current practice in Government forests;
Coast erosion;
Agricultural marketing schemes;
Town and country planning, in its various aspects, including the planning of built-up areas, Papers on which were read at several Branch meetings;
The taxation of agricultural estates;
The Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933.

Special mention must be made of the Memorandum of evidence prepared by the Scottish Branch for the Scottish Departmental Committee on Housing before whom Mr. A. Lickley Proctor (Fellow) appeared as a witness; and of the Irish Free State Branch for their work in securing the amendments to a Bill for the registration of auctioneers, valuers and estate agents in the Irish Free State which were necessary to protect the rights of present and future members of The Institution in Ireland.

Reference was made in the last Annual Report to the formation of a Branch of The Institution in East Africa. That Branch is now in active being and has already done much to promote the welfare and recognition of the profession in its area. Particulars of the constitution of that Branch, together with general information concerning the profession and The Institution, have been transmitted by the Colonial Office to the Governments of Kenya, Uganda, Nyasaland, Zanzibar, and Tanganyika territory with satisfactory results.

It was a source of satisfaction to learn from Sir Edgar Horne, Bt. (Past-President), at the conclusion of his visit to South Africa and Kenya this year, that he had been impressed with the high standard of professional practice and attainment among the members whom he had met in those parts of the Empire, and with the value which they placed upon their connection with The Institution.

The Conference between the Council and the Chairmen and Hon. Secretaries of County Branches was held at headquarters on 6th March, where a series of useful discussions on matters of domestic interest took place.

The International Congress of Surveyors, 1934.

The arrangements for the Fifth International Congress of Surveyors to be held at The Institution from the 18th to 21st July are now well advanced. At the Congress, Papers of professional interest will be discussed, and the matters to be dealt with will relate not only to surveying in the restricted sense of the measurement and mapping of land, but will comprise those covered by the more liberal interpretation of the term as used in Great Britain.

A comprehensive social programme has been arranged, which, in addition to a number of tours round London and its environs, includes a Government Reception, by kind invitation of H.M. Government, at Lancaster House, a Reception, by kind invitation of the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of the City of London in the Guildhall, and a Garden Party, by gracious permission of H.M. the King, at Hampton Court Palace. A special luncheon is being given to quantity surveyor delegates, and junior delegates will take part in a special visit to Windsor Castle.

The Junior Organisation.

The Junior Organisation has had an active year. Apart from the work of the Junior Committee at headquarters, the Chairmen and Hon. Secretary have satisfied themselves, by the personal visits which they have made to the great majority of the Junior Branches throughout the country, that the younger members are availing themselves well of the opportunities which the Junior Branch Organisation provides of playing an active and useful part in Institution affairs.

The following was the programme of Papers read and discussed at the meetings of the Junior Organisation during the session:—

Date	Subject of Paper.	Author.
1933. Nov. 6 ...	Drainage Rating. (Awarded the President's Prize)	Mr. R. W. Jolly (Professional Associate).
Dec. 13 ...	The Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928. (Awarded the Ryde Memorial Prize by the Chartered Surveyors' (1913) Club)	Mr. L. C. Harris (Professional Associate).
1934. Jan. 15 ...	The History of Coal Mines and the Valuation of Collieries for Rating Purposes	Mr. J. A. Parks (Probationer).
Mar. 15 ...	Factory Valuations... ...	Mr. E. G. Good (Probationer).
April 12	Some Notes on the Prevention of Slums	Mr. A. K. Dowse (Professional Associate).
May 14 ...	The Reform of Local Government	Mr. F. Cull (Professional Associate).

In addition to the above a meeting was held on 15th February, 1934, at which a mock inquiry under the Housing Acts, 1925 and 1930, was arranged. Mr. Sydney A. Smith (Fellow) acted as the Inspector of the Ministry of Health.

Mr. K. E. B. Glenny (Fellow) was awarded the Chartered Surveyors' (1913) Club Special Prize for having made the best contribution, otherwise than by the writing of a Paper, to the success of the meetings of the Junior Organisation during the year.

The Annual Full Committee Meeting was held on 14th December to discuss matters of domestic interest. It is satisfactory to record that seventeen out of the eighteen Junior Branches were represented at the meeting, in addition to the London and unattached country members.

The Annual Dinner was held at the Park Lane Hotel on 14th December, and was attended by 127 persons, including the President of The Institution, the President of the Land Agents' Society, Sir Francis Floud, K.B.E. (Permanent Secretary, Ministry of Labour), and other distinguished guests.

The Annual Dance, in aid of the Chartered Surveyors' Benevolent Fund, was held at the Princes Galleries, Piccadilly, W.1, on 26th January, and was greatly enjoyed. The profits handed to the Benevolent Fund amounted to £28 9*s*. 5*d*.

The Chairman for the year was Mr. John A. F. Watson, who had held the appointment of Hon. Secretary for five years previously, and the Hon. Secretary, Mr. Frank J. Trumper. The names of the Junior Committee appear in the current List of Members. To them and to the members responsible for directing the work of the eighteen Junior Branches throughout the country the sincere thanks of the Council are due for their invaluable work for The Institution during the year.

The Appointments Register.

The condition of the Register, particularly in the latter part of the period under review, has reflected the increasing confidence which is at last making itself felt in the general economic outlook. During the year from May last there were 409 names on the Register as compared with 456 for the corresponding period for 1932-1933. Of these 202 (as compared with 241) were at one time or another out of employment, and 179 (as compared with 199) were looking out for better appointments. The remainder were registered as desirous of obtaining part-time work, or were on leave from abroad and in search of temporary employment in this country.

The number of appointments obtained through the medium of the Register during the year was 120 (as compared with 98 for the corresponding period last year). Of these 5 were in the land agency branch, 37 in the valuation branch, and 21 and 57 respectively in building and quantities. Seven others began private practice or obtained partnerships.

At the request of Army Headquarters, India, the Chairman of the Quantity Surveyors' Committee has nominated nine Chartered Quantity Surveyors for appointment as Assistant Surveyors of Works, with the status of commissioned officers, upon the new technical staff for the examination of military works in India, the recruitment of which is expected to be authorised by the Government of India in the near future.

As part of the modernisation of the office equipment of The Institution, a new and improved system of indexing and tabulating particulars has been introduced so as to make the working of the Appointments Register more efficient. Every member who places his name on the Register is now expressly requested to call upon the Secretary or Assistant Secretary for a personal interview.

Once again the Council desire to invite members to remember the existence of the Register whenever they have a technical appointment to fill.

Miscellaneous.

A tent was provided by The Institution at the Bath and West Show, held at Wimbledon at the end of May last, for the use of members and their guests. It was visited by some 550 persons. The hospitality of the tent was also extended to members of the Land Agents' Society, who returned it firstly by making members of The Institution honorary members of the Society's tent at the Royal Show in July last, and then by issuing a standing invitation to members in respect of future Royal Shows. The Council desire to take this opportunity of acknowledging a most graceful act of courtesy on the part of the Society.

In June last a grant of 200 guineas was made to the Livestock Emergency Committee, in aid of expenditure incurred in lodging objections and in substituting alternative proposals at the public enquiry upon the Pigs Marketing Scheme ; and in support of the interests of live-stock auctioneers, who were not members of any society other than The Institution.

The Institution joined with the Federated Home-Grown Timber Merchants' Associations and other bodies in a deputation to the Minister of Transport to urge that the Finance Bill, 1933, should be amended so as to secure for mechanical vehicles used for timber hauling treatment similar to that proposed in regard to the taxation of vehicles used for the transport of agricultural produce.

In December representatives of The Institution and other interested bodies attended upon a deputation to the Financial Secretary to the Treasury to urge the establishment of quotas, or alternatively a scale of import duties on imported manufactured or semi-manufactured hardwoods. The reply given on behalf of the Government was summarised on page 602 of the " Journal " for May.

Meetings have taken place with the Central Landowners' Association, the Federated Home-Grown Timber Merchants' Association, and the kindred professional Societies interested, with reference to the abolition of the forfeiture clause from contracts for the sale of timber.

As the result of representations made by the Council, success in the professional examinations of The Institution has now been recognised by the Army Council as a qualification for engineer pay in the case of members holding Territorial and Supplementary Reserve commissions in the Corps of Royal Engineers.

The standing of The Institution has again received statutory recognition. By Section 5 of the London and North Eastern Railway Act, 1933, any differences that may arise upon the matters referred to in the section are to be determined by a single arbitrator appointed by the President.

The Report of the Departmental Committee of the Ministry of Health on the Qualifications, Recruitment, Training and Promotion of Local Government officers was issued in February. Evidence, written and oral, was given before this Committee by Mr. Frank Hunt, C.V.O. (Member of Council) and Mr. Alexander Goddard, C.B.E. (the late Secretary). Several references appear in the Report to the evidence given by The Institution.

An interim report of the Inter-Departmental Committee on the Utilisation of Home-Grown Timber was issued in October. The personnel of this Committee included Lord Clinton (Hon. Member) and Mr. W. L. Taylor (Fellow).

Sir John Oakley, G.B.E., and Mr. Dendy Watney (Past-Presidents) were appointed during the year to represent The Institution upon the newly constituted Aerodromes Advisory Board. The Board, which consists of representative members nominated by a number of leading professional Societies, together with members nominated by the Air Ministry, the Ministry of Health and the Electricity Commissioners, has been set up as a permanent organisation with the general object of securing the sound design of aerodrome lay-out and equipment, the provision of an adequate number of properly sited aerodromes, the reservation of sites for future aerodromes, and of bringing aerodromes and aerodrome sites into a right relationship with town and country planning schemes, and the development of airways. Mr. W. R. Davidge, Mr. F. Longstreth

Thompson and Mr. G. L. Pepler (Fellows) are also members of the Board.

Mr. Francis J. Kirby (Fellow) was appointed in March as a third official arbitrator under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919.

Mr. C. Gerald Eve (Past-President) has been invited by the Minister of Health to represent The Institution on the Advisory Committee which is to be set up to advise the Minister upon general questions relating to the administration of town and country planning.

Mr. A. S. Bennion (Fellow) was appointed during the year as a member of the Departmental Committee of the Ministry of Health on the Cost of Hospitals and Public Institutions.

Mr. J. W. Tyler and Mr. R. B. Mann (Fellows) have been appointed as the representatives of The Institution respectively upon the Architects' Registration Council and upon the Admission Committee of that Council in the place of Mr. Dendy Watney (Past-President) and Mr. H. A. Steward (Hon. Secretary), who have retired.

Mr. J. M. Theobald (Vice-President) was appointed as a member of the Selection Board, which was set up in October, 1933, to interview and select candidates for permanent appointment as assistant surveyors in the Admiralty and Air Ministry. Mr. Robert Hendry (Member of Council) was appointed in November as a member of a similar Board in connection with appointments to the Valuation Office (Scotland).

The Institution has been consulted during the year by the British Standards Institution upon proposed British Standard Specifications for the following:—

> Concrete Aggregates, High Tensile Structural Steel, Cement-Concrete Pipes, Concrete Interlocking Tiles, Socket Gas Connections, Asbestos Pipes and Gutters, Bituminous Roofing Felt and Damp-proof Courses, Cement, Spigot and Socket-Flue Pipes, Building Limes, Hot-Process Asphalt Road Surfacing, Wooden Stairs, Names of Softwoods, Sash-Cords, Plated Finishings for Fittings and Equipment, Salt-Glaze Ware Pipes, and Grading of Plywood Veneers.

Mr. E. J. Silcock (Member of Council) acted as Chairman of the Committee of the British Standards Institution which was responsible for preparing the last-mentioned specification.

Mr. J. E. Bidwell (Past-President) was nominated to succeed Mr. W. T. Hall (Fellow) as one of the representatives of The Institution on the Council for the Preservation of Rural England, of which The Institution is a constituent body.

Mr. F. G. Rudler (Fellow) was elected Mayor of Westminster for the year 1933-1934, and Mr. R. M. Chart (Fellow) as the first Mayor of the new Borough of Mitcham.

Sir Maurice Gwyer, K.C.B., K.C. (Associate), has been appointed as First Parliamentary Counsel to the Treasury.

Mr. R. Hardy Syms (Fellow) was appointed during the year as Chief Technical Adviser to the Greater London Regional Planning Committee in succession to Sir Raymond Unwin, P.P.R.I.B.A.

The President has made the following appointments to Committees, which have been set up during the year, under private Acts or town planning schemes for the purpose of advising local authorities upon the elevations of buildings:—

Exeter Corporation : Mr. HARRY BOWDEN (Fellow).

Reigate Corporation :
Banstead Urban District Council :
Leatherhead Urban District Council : } Mr. J. A. ROSEVEAR (Fellow).

Atcham Rural District Council : Mr. L. O. MATHEWS (Fellow).

Chelmsford Rural District Council : Mr. HUGH KEMSLEY (Fellow).

Godstone Rural District Council : Mr. D. G. MOTION (Fellow).

Maidstone Rural District Council : Mr. A. W. BRACKETT (Fellow).

The names of the following members appeared in the Birthday and New Year's Honours Lists during the period under review:—

Lord Clinton	G.C.V.O.
Sir Charles Howell Thomas, K.C.B.	K.C.M.G.
Col. John Brown, C.B.E., D.S.O. ...	K.C.B.
Mr. J. H. Salmon	O.B.E.
Mr. L. J. Veit	O.B.E.

ADDENDUM.

Notes from the Reports of the Examiners, 1934.

These notes are written with the special object of calling attention to defects in the work of candidates in the examinations, in particular to features to which too little attention has apparently been given and to the respects in which special want of preparation was shown. They are not primarily intended to be a general review of the examination work for the year.

Less comment is made this year on bad grammar and spelling, but cases still occurred and were referred to by the examiners in two of the papers on Report. The spelling of the word " accommodation " presented difficulty to a number of candidates.

Marks were frequently lost by careless reading of questions and instructions, or by failure to study their exact meaning. The examiners in Valuations reported cases of untidy working and faulty arithmetic. Candidates might also remember that it is a convenience to the examiner if answers are submitted in their proper order and are written on one side of the paper only.

Applied Geology.—Apart from a rudimentary knowledge of some of the more obvious facts, the standard is reported as low. There does not appear to have been any real study of applied Geology as a subject of its own, for example, of the latest trends and movements of trade combined with an up-to-date acquaintance with the location and geological structure of mineral deposits of all kinds.

Answers were badly written and badly expressed, and there were mistakes in grammar and spelling.

Geology and Soils.—The standard was good on the whole, but there was some unevenness in the papers, high marks being obtained in some questions and low marks in others. The sketches, which are valuable in some answers, were not so good as usual. The questions on definitions and millstone grit and old red sandstone were poorly done.

Agriculture (Practice).—The standard was generally much higher than usual. Candidates had clearly taken an intelligent interest in the conditions of the farming industry and in the efforts of the Government to assist it.

Agricultural Science.—There was a considerable improvement on last year. Weakness, however, was evident in field work regarding practical observation of herbage, soils and natural features indicating need for particular manures, or suitability of soils for particular systems of farming. Subsoiling was often confused with deep ploughing.

Agricultural Valuations.—The standard was poor, weakness especially being shown in practical knowledge and in decisions under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923.

Forestry.—In the Intermediate weakness was shown in Forest Botany and Entomology, identification of common twigs, and timber utilisation. The indoor work in the Final is reported as good, but outdoor work was not satisfactory. Too much attention seems to have been given to minor points of sylviculture as distinct from the acquisition of a general knowledge of woodland management and commercial utilisation. While questions dealing with identification and measurement were well done, an unreasonably large number of candidates could not differentiate between well-managed woodlands and those in urgent need of thinning. The examiner remarks that the duty of a land agent is to supervise and criticise, and if his forest knowledge is merely that of a woodman he will never be able to carry out his proper function.

Other points of weakness in the outdoor work were the manufacture and use of yield tables, definition and use of a form factor, and ignorance concerning dutch elm disease and the elm bark beetle. Only four candidates were able correctly to describe a saw-mill in simple technical language.

Land Drainage.—A marked improvement on recent years was shown, but more attention should be given to arterial drainage and to the provisions of the Land Drainage Act, 1930.

Draughtsmanship.—An improvement on last year, but there was carelessness as to the scale. Some candidates did not bring drawing instruments with them. Many answers, though properly given, were badly expressed.

Farm Homesteads and Building Construction.—Not satisfactory ; the drawings and sketches submitted by many candidates were untidy and crude.

Constructive and Working Drawings.—In the higher papers, with the exception of the few candidates who did exceptionally well, draughtsmanship was still poor. The question on the timber roof truss was badly answered.

In the lower papers draughtsmanship is reported as sufficiently good, but weakness was shown in scaffolding and the regulations thereon ; fire-resisting constructions ; roof construction ; joints in carpenters' and joiners' work ; bonding of bricklayers' and masons' work ; glasiers' work ; making of joints in stoneware drains ; weights and strength of materials, and the working out of simple calculations.

Comment is made upon a lack of knowledge of modern methods of construction and upon the fact that isometric projection is not being practised as a means of three-dimensional illustration.

Drainage and Sanitation.—The standard in the Intermediate was lower than last year, a fact which in the examiner's opinion is due to a more general lack of preparation, as distinct from weakness in one division of the subject. The sketches submitted with the answers to Question 2 were in many cases of apparatus which a little consideration would have shown could not work. The terms "drain" and "soil-pipe" were used indiscriminately. Several candidates thought that lead was a manufactured product and gave recipes for its manufacture.

In the Final paper it seemed that the principles of rating boilers for their two differing common usages had not been taught at all, and knowledge of practical details in hot-water work and plumbing was sadly deficient. Apart from these weaknesses, the general standard is reported as fair.

Measurement of Builders' Work.—Fair, but there is room for improvement in method. Dimensions were in many cases mixed up and not put in the right order. Few candidates numbered their columns. In many cases carcassing and finishings were jumbled together.

Measurement and Valuation of Dilapidations.—There was a marked improvement on the last two years, but there was still a tendency to confuse wording appropriate to a builder's specification with a schedule of dilapidations. There was not much knowledge of elementary basic prices as demanded by Question 1.

Quantities.—In the morning paper for the Final too little attention was given by candidates to acquiring an ability accurately to describe the various items. The examiner for the afternoon paper for the Final reports an improvement on last year, but states that the standard is still too low. Want of preparation is shown in the bonding of stonework.

In the paper on "Analysis of building prices" the standard generally was high.

In the Intermediate the "working-up" as a whole proved satisfactory, but many candidates fail to appreciate that the abstract is practically a draft bill, and that the object of the bill is to present a concise and instructive document to the estimator. In " taking off " the general standard is below the average. Candidates do not appreciate the necessity of approaching their subject in an orderly manner. Annotation of dimensions is particularly absent, while the elementary methods of obtaining the perimeter of a building are not clearly understood. In many cases candidates show a lack of knowledge of materials, and a distinct preference for scaling from drawings in lieu of building up their data from figured dimensions.

Principles and Practice of Valuations.—The papers generally were not of a high standard, and a lack of knowledge of the elementary principles of valuation was in evidence. Many candidates failed to read the question properly, and the general standard of handwriting and arrangement of answers was poor.

Valuation of Land and Buildings.—The method of ascertaining the sitting rent was not generally understood. Too many candidates were confused in the choice of the valuation table. The amount of £1 per annum is too frequently used instead of p.v. of £1 per annum.

Application and Use of Valuation Tables.—The most prevalent faults were confusion as to the proper use of dual-rate years' purchase tables; difficulty in dealing with the necessary valuations arising on the surrender of a lease, and the taking up of a new lease for a longer term; and a misunderstanding of the instruction that, generally, when valuing a ground rent with reversion over 60 years distant, the value of the reversion can be ignored, and the ground rent valued as though receivable in perpetuity. Many candidates capitalised the ground rent at the y.p. for the term unexpired and ignored the reversion.

Valuation of Mineral Properties.—Some lack of knowledge of the principles of valuation was apparent, and weakness was shown in the application of interest tables. Candidates again failed to allow for faults and bad coal, and did not appreciate the effect of " shorts " nor of income tax being chargeable to sinking fund.

Mineral Leases.—Good, but some weakness was shown in the proper wording of lease clauses.

Mine Surveying.—In the Intermediate some weakness was shown in solving the area of a figure by co-ordinates. The standard in the Final was only moderate; too much time was wasted in lengthy methods of calculation. There was a surprising failure on the part of any candidate to answer Question 2, having regard to the recent publicity on the " Optical Micrometer Theodolite."

Support and Subsidence.—Good; but no candidate was able to set out accurately the acts which comprise the Mining Code.

Surveying (Indoor).—The standard was generally very fair; but the effects of errors in the permanent adjustment of a theodolite on field work were imperfectly understood. Too little attention had been given to the process of traverse surveying by the back angle method.

Levelling (Indoor).—Good; but most candidates missed the importance of proper instructions to, and supervision of, the staff holder. The principles on which common types of levelling instruments are constructed were indifferently understood.

Local Taxation.—The standard was much improved compared with previous years, but there was a tendency in some cases to confuse local with Imperial taxation.

Estate Accounts.—The good standard of last year was generally maintained; but many candidates were deficient in their knowledge of statutory allowances for repairs, and were therefore unable to calculate amounts of net Schedule A assessments. The underlying principles of double-entry book-keeping and the setting out of ledger accounts needs more attention.

Road-making.—The standard showed some improvement, particularly in the application of geodesy to road work and the requirements for subsoil drainage. There is still room, however, for a good deal of improvement in knowledge of modern methods of construction, surface treatment and maintenance.

Town Planning and Building Estates.—The examiner reports an advance on the standard of last year. Weakness, however, was shown in the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, especially those with reference to rights of appeal both during the making of a planning scheme and after it has become operative. There was still too little appreciation of the minimum sizes of plots required in modern building development and the necessity of eliminating all unnecessary roads in view of the high costs of construction.

Report.—The standard achieved by land agency and mining candidates was fairly satisfactory, but in the former sub-division some candidates were guilty of errors in spelling and the use of unnecessary verbiage. Many, also, attached overdue importance to decorations in agricultural properties.

The examiner in Sub-Division II. states that many candidates still fail to recite the precise reason for the Report, and that the legal requirements of a mortgage valuation for trustees might well be stressed. Few candidates comment on town planning and like restrictions and on rating assessments, nor do they qualify their recommendations by saying that they are made on the assumption that there are no burdens on the property other than those dealt with in the Report. The source of information is also seldom stated.

In Sub-Division III. candidates' technical knowledge was of a higher standard than their ability to present it to a client. Spelling was weak in many cases. In the planning of the bedroom and bathroom many candidates had no regard to the disposition of the furniture in the bedroom, and were uncertain as to the power of the local authority to require separate soil and surface-water drainage connections to an existing building.

Law of Landlord and Tenant.—The standard generally was high. Some weakness, however, was shown in the compensation clauses of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, and in a tendency to confuse building agreements with contracts for the carrying out of building works.

Law of Fixtures and Dilapidations.—The standard in Sub-Division II. is reported as distinctly good in Part II. of the paper (Law of Dilapidations), but there is evidence that candidates have concentrated on that part of the paper at the expense of the law of fixtures. The standard in Sub-Division III. was less satisfactory. Candidates would be well advised to make a closer study of leading cases with a view to obtaining a more thorough grasp of general principles.

Law of Easements.—The standard showed improvement on last year. It was noticeable, however, that very few candidates attempted the question on leading cases.

Law of Mortgages.—The standard was disappointing and compared badly with the high level reached last year. Too many of the candidates knew very little of the subject. A high proportion failed to obtain any marks at all for their answers to the question asking for a definition of a mortgage.

Law of Vendors and Purchasers.—Very fair on the whole ; but only the better candidates attempted to discuss the connection of documents under Question 1. The questions on the sale of land were better done than those on the sale of goods.

Law of Arbitration.—A good all-round standard was attained. Some weakness, however, was shown on the question how a case should be stated for the court, and on the question of costs. Too many candidates seemed to think that costs mean the arbitrator's own remuneration.

The London Building Act, 1930.—The standard was not very good, particularly in knowledge of general detail.

ROYAL CHARTERS.

Royal Charters are granted by the Sovereign on the advice of the Lords of His Privy Council.

The grant of a Charter to a professional society may therefore be taken as indicating that the highest authority in the kingdom is satisfied that a high standard of professional qualification is required for membership, and that the society is in a position to advance technical knowledge, to raise and maintain the status of the profession it represents, and to provide information on subjects coming within its scope to the public advantage.

The Chartered Surveyors' Institution

(Incorporated by Royal Charter)

Is established under the terms of its Royal Charters :—

1. To secure the advancement and facilitate the acquisition of that knowledge which constitutes the profession of a Surveyor, viz.—the art of determining the value of all descriptions of landed, mineral and house property, and of the various interests therein; the practice of managing and developing estates; and the science of admeasuring and delineating the physical features of the earth, and of measuring and estimating artificers' work.
2. To promote the general interests of the profession, and to maintain and extend its usefulness for the public advantage.

The Institution was founded in 1868 under the title of The Institution of Surveyors. It was incorporated under Royal Charter in 1881, the name then being changed to The Surveyors' Institution. A further Charter was granted in 1921. In October, 1930, by permission of H.M.'s Privy Council the title of the Institution was changed to The Chartered Surveyors' Institution. Entrance examinations to qualify for membership were started in 1881, and became compulsory in 1891. The Institution was, therefore, the first professional society, other than those representing law and medicine, to initiate severe examination tests as the qualification for membership.

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERSHIP.

Fellows and Professional Associates are permitted to place the initials F.S.I. and P.A.S.I. respectively after their names, and to use the designation "Chartered Surveyor," subject to the provisions of the By-Laws. Membership of the Institution, as indicated by the use of these letters and designation, is laid down as an essential qualification for many official and other appointments. Its value is also becoming increasingly recognised in connection with work for trustees, mortgage valuations, arbitrations, evidence before the Courts, etc.

Members, both corporate and non-corporate, have the right to attend the Ordinary General Meetings, meetings of their County Branch, and, if under 33 years of age, the Junior Meetings, and have the privilege of introducing visitors. They receive the Journal, which is issued in twelve monthly parts, and a copy of any other printed publication issued by the Institution. They may avail themselves of the Queries and Replies section of the Journal, and so secure the benefit of the knowledge and experience of fellow members in questions arising in daily practice. They may use the Library and Loan Library and the Employment Register.

The Chartered Surveyors' Benevolent Fund is established to provide for the needs of members and their dependents who, by reason of age, sickness or other unavoidable misfortune, are unable to support themselves. It is maintained entirely by voluntary contributions.

ORGANISATION AND ACTIVITIES.

The affairs of the Institution are under the management of a Council, elected annually by ballot of all corporate members. The Council are advised by the County Branches and a number of Standing and Special Committees appointed to consider the various matters referred to them. Their work includes the examination of Parliamentary Bills affecting the valuation, management, and development of landed property, and the various interests therein ; the preparation of memoranda, and the submission of evidence for the use of Government Departments, Royal Commissions and departmental and other Committees in connection with matters upon which the collective knowledge of the profession would prove of assistance ; and the rendering of advice to Imperial or Local Authorities when called upon to do so by statute or otherwise.

In addition to their activities in the advancement of the public interest, the Council have continually in view the elevation, ethical as well as intellectual, of the profession which they represent. In addition to the practical help which they have afforded to places of professional instruction, the foundation of scholarships and the furtherance of technical education generally, they have felt it their duty strictly to administer the laws of conduct which all members are required by the By-Laws to observe. The Council have also, through their Professional Practice Committee, used their influence in inspiring a high ideal of professional honour among members.

The Session of the Institution commences annually on the second Monday in November, and continues to the end of May. The Ordinary General Meetings are held monthly during the Session, and in addition two Meetings of members practising in Quantities are arranged. At these Meetings original papers on professional subjects are read and their merits fully and freely discussed. Every member has the privilege of introducing visitors.

THE COUNTY BRANCHES.

The organisation of the Institution includes a system of Metropolitan and County Branches, the object of which is to enable the Council to give the considered views of the profession from all parts of the country on matters of public interest; to afford opportunity for members generally to take an active part in the affairs of the Institution; and to assist the Council in ascertaining their local wants and wishes. The system includes machinery for local representation on, and succession to, the Council and Standing Committees and provides, in addition, opportunities for the discussion of professional questions and social intercourse at centres easily accessible to members in country districts. The affairs of each Metropolitan and County Branch are managed by an Executive Committee elected annually.

THE JUNIOR ORGANISATION.

The Junior Organisation was established for the benefit of the younger members of the Institution, to bring them into closer touch with the Council, and, by fostering among them an interest in professional affairs, to prepare them for higher office in the future. The work of the Junior Organisation is administered by a representative Central Executive Committee which is responsible to the Council for their affairs as a whole. Junior branches in the County Branch districts have been established in seventeen County Branch areas.

SCHOLARSHIPS AND PRIZES.

The Institution offers each year a scholarship of £100 per annum, tenable at Cambridge University for three years, in a course of study selected by the successful applicant out of several prescribed by the Council, and three one-year courses of £125, also tenable at Cambridge unless the selected candidate has applied to use his emoluments for the purpose of travel. The holder of a one-year course is required to state the direction in which he wishes to study, and to undergo such courses of lectures and instruction as may be prescribed, and to carry out an original piece of work under his supervisor's guidance. Detailed particulars of the conditions may be obtained on application to the Secretary.

A number of valuable prizes are offered in connection with the Institution Examinations.

MEMBERSHIP.

The total membership of the Institution is nearly 8,000, and consists of four classes, viz.: HONORARY MEMBERS, FELLOWS, PROFESSIONAL ASSOCIATES, AND ASSOCIATES. There are also classes of PROBATIONERS and STUDENTS attached to, but not corporate members of, the Institution.

Students.—In order to qualify for admission to the Class of Students, candidates must be between the ages of 18 and 21, must have passed either the Preliminary Examination of the Institution or one of the specified Examinations accepted in lieu thereof, and must be either (1) pupils or technical assistants in the offices of members of the Institution or other persons substantially engaged in one or other of the branches of the profession as defined above; or (2) studying with a view to entering the profession at such places of professional instruction as the Council may approve.

Candidates under the age of 21 are advised to become Students; for, in addition to the use of the Library and Loan Library, they secure the Journal and are entitled to attend meetings.

Students remain attached to their class until the end of the calendar year in which they attain the age of 21, and may then be enrolled in the class of Probationers.

Probationers are persons whose period of Studentship has expired or who have passed the Intermediate Examination. They may continue as Probationers until the end of the calendar year during which they shall have been for five years enrolled in that class, or until the end of the third calendar year after that in which they passed the Intermediate Examination, whichever period first terminates.

All candidates for the Intermediate Examination are required to give an undertaking that, if successful in passing, they will forthwith become Probationers and so remain for the full term allowed by the By-Laws.

Probationers are entitled to use the Library and Loan Library, to attend meetings and to receive the publications.

Professional Associates.—Candidates desirous of election to the class of Professional Associates must be not less than 21 years of age, and must have passed the Preliminary Examination (or an examination accepted in lieu thereof) and the Intermediate and Final Examinations. Candidates holding a University degree in subjects approved by the Council as appertaining to the surveying profession may take a single examination in place of the Intermediate and Final. After passing the examinations, candidates are eligible for election to the class of Professional Associates, provided that they are no longer in statu pupillari and are actually engaged in professional work as Surveyors.

Holders of the B.A. and B.Sc. degrees in Estate Management, granted respectively by the Universities of Cambridge and London, may be elected as Professional Associates without examination on satisfying the Council that they are engaged in professional work and have received proper practical training in the profession.

Fellows.—Candidates must be not less than 30 years of age, must have passed either (1) the Preliminary or an exempting examination and the Intermediate and Final Examinations, or

(2) the Direct Fellowship Examination; and must have held for five years, and be holding, a position of complete responsibility equivalent to that of a principal in an established business.

There are special arrangements for the election of Colonial Fellows.

ASSOCIATES must be persons over 21 years of age, not Surveyors by profession, whose pursuits are such as to qualify them to co-operate with Surveyors in the advancement of professional knowledge.

HONORARY MEMBERS must be persons who, either by reason of their position or experience, or their eminence in science, may be enabled to render assistance in promoting the objects of the Institution; but are not engaged in practice as Surveyors in Great Britain or Ireland. They have the privilege of being present and taking part in all Ordinary General Meetings, and of access to the Library, but no right of voting, discussing or otherwise interfering in the affairs of the Institution; nor are they called upon to contribute to its funds.

ELECTION TO MEMBERSHIP, other than Honorary Membership, is by ballot of all the corporate members of the Institution. All Fellows, Professional Associates and Associates are required, within twelve months of their election, to attend an Ordinary General Meeting, or, in the case of members residing at a distance from London, a meeting of their County Branch, for the purpose of formal introduction, and to sign the Register. They are also required, within the same period, to deliver to the Council an original paper on a subject connected with the profession, or to make a donation to the Library Fund.

EXAMINATIONS.

THE PRELIMINARY AND SPECIAL EXAMINATIONS.—Any candidate intending to follow the profession of Surveyor will be accepted on application, but acceptance for the Preliminary Examination does not imply that a candidate, if successful in passing, will necessarily be regarded as eligible for enrolment as a Student, or for admission to the Intermediate and Final Examinations. There are no age limits, but candidates over the age of 25 are permitted to sit for a special Examination, instead of the Preliminary, to test their general knowledge and education. The entrance fee for the examination is £1 11*s.* 6*d.*

THE INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATION.—A Candidate, unless studying at a recognised place of instruction, must be a pupil or technical assistant* in the office of a member of the Institution or other person substantially engaged in the profession of Surveyor as defined above. The entrance fee for the Examination is £5 5*s*. 0*d*.

A Candidate taking Part I only of the Intermediate Examination may do so before reaching the age of 19 provided he has passed the Preliminary (or exempting) examination.

A Candidate taking Part II of the examination, either with or without Part I, must not be less than 19 years of age at the date of the examination. No exception to this rule will be made.

THE FINAL EXAMINATION is open to candidates who have passed the Intermediate Examination; the entrance fee is £5 5*s*. 0*d*.

THE DIRECT FELLOWSHIP EXAMINATION.—Candidates for this Examination must be more than 30 years of age, and their position must be such as would make them eligible for direct election as Fellows on passing the Examination. The entrance fee is £5 5*s*. 0*d*.

The Preliminary and Special Examinations are held annually in January, and the Intermediate, Final and Direct Fellowship Examinations in March. Applications to sit for any one of the Examinations must be on the prescribed forms and must be submitted, together with the examination fees, during the previous September.

The Intermediate, Final, and Direct Fellowship Examinations are divided into four Sub-Divisions, to cover the four main branches into which the profession may roughly be divided, viz.:—I., Chiefly Land Agency; II., Chiefly Valuation; III., Chiefly Building or Quantities; and IV., Chiefly Mining. Candidates may elect to be examined in any one of these sub-divisions, but those proceeding to the Final Examination after passing the Intermediate must do so in the same sub-division.

THE SPECIAL SINGLE EXAMINATION for holders of University degrees in a course of study approved by the Council as bearing upon the profession, is held concurrently with the other professional examinations, and combines the subjects required to be taken in both the Intermediate and Final. Entance fee £5 5*s*.

Copies of the rules governing the examinations and giving full particulars thereof, may be obtained from the Secretary on application. The detailed Syllabus and List of Text-Books (which relates to the professional examinations only) can be obtained at a charge of 1*s*., and past examination papers at 2*s*. for each annual set.

* Articles, although much to be recommended as a method of training for the profession, are not an essential condition of admission to the Examinations.

THE LIBRARY AND COLLECTIONS.

The Institution Library contains approximately 12,000 volumes, and includes a topographical section comprising the great County Histories, all the principal local histories, and a London collection ; a series of works on British Agriculture, both ancient and modern, and the allied subjects of Forestry, Geology, Botany, Agricultural Chemistry and Vegetable Physiology ; a complete series of professional text-books, including the latest works ; works of general science ; the Public General Statutes from the earliest times ; Law Reports and Law Text-Books: Parliamentary Papers and Reports ; the Transactions of kindred societies and general works of reference. It also contains a complete set of the Regional Planning Schemes ; all the Town Planning Schemes which so far have been approved by the Minister ; a number of valuable single works and rare editions of special interest to the book-lover, as well as a collection of old maps, charts and plans.

The Loan Library is independent of the General Reference Library, and contains some 1,600 volumes, including all the principal professional text-books, which may be borrowed by members according to the prescribed rules.

The Forestry Collection contains a series of home-grown timber exhibits in planks and sections ; preserved specimens of the foliage, flowers and fruit of the more common British trees and of timber insects, injurious and otherwise ; and a collection of saws, tools and other implements used in forestry. Various causes of damage to timber and the commercial uses to which British woods may be put, are also illustrated.

The Geological Museum includes specimens of the fossils found in British geological formations and a collection of stones used in building.

CODE OF CONDUCT FOR OBSERVANCE BY CHARTERED SURVEYORS.

Care should be taken that the form and phraseology of all advertisements, circulars, or letters issued by Chartered Surveyors, whether in the Press or by other means, are not such as would be liable to lower the status of the Institution in the estimation of other professional men or of the public.

A.—CIRCULARS AND LETTERS.

The work of a surveyor may conveniently be divided under two heads, (1) that which is purely professional in character, and (2) the sale or letting of property in connection with which a certain amount of the commercial element is introduced.

(1) Professional Work.

Chartered Surveyors shall not address, except to clients, circulars or letters soliciting instructions for professional work.

This rule does not apply to the issue of circulars or letters for the purpose of making known the opening of a new firm or branch office, changes of address, or alterations in the partnership or constitution of a firm

(2) Sales and Lettings.

The prohibition referred to in (1) Professional Work does not apply to letters addressed to owners inviting instructions for the sale of a property provided that :—

(a) Where the property is under the management of a regular agent or is in the hands of a sole agent, whose name is reasonably ascertainable, the letter is addressed to such person ; or

(b) The letter contains a statement that if another surveyor or agent is regularly employed by the recipient, it should be either disregarded or passed on to such person.

B.—CANVASSING BY PERSONAL CALL.

Should not be permitted to a Chartered Surveyor or a member of his staff.

C.—ADVERTISEMENTS.

(i) Press advertisements of future sales and lettings, and dates of sales, etc., are permitted.

(ii) Card advertisements in the Press setting out the title and address of a firm, the qualifications of its partners, and accompanied by a short statement of the branch or branches of the profession in which they practise, are permitted.

(iii) General advertisements by board, poster, etc., of future sales and lettings, and dates of sales, etc., are permitted.

(iv) Poster advertisements of the card type, setting out the title and address of the firm, the qualifications of the partners, and the branch or branches in which they practise, exhibited on boards or spaces belonging to or regularly occupied by the firm and usually employed for the advertisement of sales and lettings, are permitted. Advertisements of this nature, exhibited on walls, hoardings and other places commonly used for commercial advertisements, are not permitted.

(v) The exhibition of card type advertisements of this nature on a cinema screen or in any other place of public entertainment is not permitted.

D.—CHARGES.

(i) The Institution Schedule of Charges should be looked upon as an indication of what would be considered a reasonable fee in ordinary and average circumstances. No Member of the Institution is permitted to compete with other surveyors by quoting fees which would be unfair to them.

(ii) An offer to accept instructions for professional work on the basis that no fee will be charged unless a successful result is attained, would be looked upon as unprofessional.

E.—LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES.

Chartered Surveyors must accept full liability for advice given to clients on professional matters. On these grounds, they will not in future be permitted to convert their firms into limited liability companies unless special circumstances approved by the Council exist.

F.—TAX COLLECTIONS.

Chartered Surveyors are not permitted to accept appointment as or undertake the duties of collectors of income tax.

G.—SUNDAY OPENING OF OFFICES.

In the absence of special circumstances approved by the Council the opening of offices on Sunday for general business with the public should be looked upon as objectionable.

H.—Chartered Surveyors will be held responsible for the acts of members of their staffs so far as they relate to matters coming within the scope of their practice.

ADDENDUM.

Chartered Surveyors are reminded of the following rules set out in By-law 24, which are deemed to be fundamental :—

(1) A Member shall not engage in or be connected with any occupation which in the opinion of the Council is inconsistent with the profession of a Surveyor.

(2) A Member shall not directly or indirectly allow or agree to allow of participation by any Solicitor or his representative, or by any accountant or liquidator, or by any of their clerks, in his charges for professional work.

(3) A Member shall not accept or give any illicit or secret trade or other discounts, commission or allowance, in connection with any works the execution of which he may be engaged to superintend, or with any other professional business which may be entrusted to him, or any goods he may order on behalf of clients.

The Council rely upon Members of the Institution to conform to these rules, which are framed for their general advantage and that of the public. Members contravening them will render themselves liable to be dealt with under the powers vested in the Council by the By-laws, although it is hoped that the cases in which a reminder of the requirements is insufficient may be exceptional.

December, 1931.

EXTRACTS FROM PRINCIPLES WHICH MUST GOVERN CHARTERED SURVEYORS IN INTERPRETING THE SCALE OF CHARGES.

The Chartered Quantity Surveyor in practice is governed by established customs accepted and observed by the Surveying profession, and more particularly by the Charter and By-laws of the Institution which render him liable in the case of unprofessional conduct to reprimand, suspension, or expulsion at the discretion of the Council.

A Quantity Surveyor is remunerated solely by his professional fees, and is debarred from any other source of remuneration in connection with the works and duties entrusted to him. A Quantity Surveyor must not accept any work which involves the giving or receiving of any discounts, gifts, or commissions whatsoever.

Quantity Surveyors may not compete with another on the basis of fees, and Chartered Quantity Surveyors must take reasonable precautions not to contravene the principle, e.g. by an intimation to the prospective client that if other surveyors are being asked to quote in competition, the offer of services is withdrawn.

Schedule of Professional Charges.
